A carillon recital that preceded the remembrance ceremony ended as squads of university members of Canada's three armed forces marched under the tower and an honor guard of three men was mounted over the Cenotaph.

President Claude T. Bissell led prayers that followed singing of "O God Our Help In Ages Past".

The clear tones of the Last Post preceded two minutes of silence. Reveille followed.

The ceremony concluded with the laying of about a dozen wreaths, representative of the University, alumnae, staff, colleges and faculties.

In Hole $32,000 As Argos Go

Withdrawal of the Toronto Argonauts from Varsity stadium at the end of this season will leave the U of T Athletic Association $230,000 in debt—with no apparent means of paying it off.

The debt represents the balance of $842,820 borrowed from the university Board of Governors to increase seating capacity in 1950 and for installation of floodlights in 1955.

The figures were presented to the Students' Administrative council last night by Morgan Dever, representative of the athletic association.

Dever said the association's plight was made worse by drops in revenue from Intercollegiate games.

Receipts for college games had dropped to $54,000 this year from the all-time high of $109,000 in 1952.

Reason why revenue from college games had dropped was "competition from professionals in our own stadium and the monster of television."

budget has been drawn up, to meet the situation.

The budget allows for feasible reductions in expenditure and takes into account a student athletic fee increase to $15. Students now pay $10.

However, many of the budget's facts are not dependable and discussion on it still continues, Dever said.

One way the association can economize is to discontinue the annual subscription of $1,000 to the SAC for the Blue-and White band.

Another is to stop taking movies of the games. This costs about $2,000 a year, Dever said.

Dever ended his report by saying some measure of financial responsibility for the athletic association will have to be assumed by the university.

Until now the association has stood on its own financial feet since it was founded in 1893.

The combined cost of maintaining the stadium and Varsity Arena comes close to $70,000 a year, he said.

Both this cost and the considerable cost of operating the intramural athletic program have always been met by the association.

Second "No" To Raisman; Definitely No Decals At All

The Students' Administrative Council still stuck to its decision last night—and refused to grant Ronald Raisman, IV UC, permission to use the U of T crest on his decal car window stickers.

The SAC is official custodian of the crest. By a vote of 11 to nine the council disapproved in principle of having the U of T crest on car stickers. Raisman was appealing a council decision made last month forbidding him to use the crest on his stickers.

The stickers have been available in several university outlets since the fall of 1957. Raisman was told to withdraw them from circulation within seven days.

Addressing the council last night Raisman suggested the SAC take a royalty on the sale of the stickers and leave him as sole distributor.

He said he was concerned about the matter "because there seems to be some reflection on my honor."

"I am not interested in making fantastic profits by the venture," he said. "The decal is a way of expressing my loyalty to the university."

He said that some 557 decals had been sold of the 936 manufactured and there had been a net loss of 87 cents.

Meds rep Bob Lee said the council's decision was not intended to cast any personnel reflection on Raisman. It had merely meant the SAC was opposed to the use of the crest on car window stickers.

Raisman asked why a "smart, dignified decal car sticker couldn't have a crest when it appears on sweatshirts, beerpugs and ashtrays."

SAC financial secretary A. E. Macdonald explained that while the council was custodian of the crest, the university owned it. Thus university facilities could use the crest with the Board of Governors' permission.

The SAC granted permission to non-university interests, he said.

During the debate a motion by Forestry rep Murray Ross accepting Raisman's proposal was defeated.

Emmanuel Home To Hart House

Hart House has finally won all her children home to her bosom.

Emmanuel College rep Barry Moore told the Students' Administrative Council last night his college had joined the House.

Emmanuel was the only institution on campus which was not a member.

The move came in a general meeting of the college Tuesday. Opposition came from Emmanuel men who felt the college was too detached and in-

Thomist Party In, Wycliffians Gripe

Wycliffe College got its third government in the space of a week yesterday, and students immediately protested its formation.

Official notice of the forming of the new government was given at 6 p.m. yesterday by Senior Student Charles Ledger, Governor-General of the college.

At 11.30 p.m. he was handed a petition signed by 22 members of the House calling for a discussion on the situation and the possibility of a new election.

When contacted for comment last night, Ledger said "I wish I knew what to say so I could say something."

A meeting will be held at 9.30 p.m. tonight for discussion he said. Meetings of the House are normally held once a month.

"An election is not provided for in our constitution," Ledger said. "We'll just have to wait and see what develops."

Wycliffe's political pains developed Monday night when the government Anti-Clerical Party was overthrown by a vote of no-confidence.

The official opposition, the Elizabethan Party Continued, formed a government that was overthrown by a similar vote Tuesday night.

The Governor-General was then faced with making a decision on the choice of a new government. Two alternatives were open to him. He could ask the leader of the Anti-Clerical Party to form a government, since he was at the time the leader of the official opposition. Or he could establish a precedent by calling a new election.

At 6 p.m. yesterday, Ledger posted a notice of his decision the text of which read:

"Regarding the meeting of the Literary Society last night (Tuesday) when non-confidence was expressed in both the opposition and the government parties, and in consideration of Article X of the Constitution which states that the Governor-General shall call upon the leader of the Opposition to form a government;

"I have called upon Mr. John Marriott to form a government, with a strong recommendation that it be composed of a substantial number of new members, so that it would be essentially different from that group in whom a lack of confidence was expressed.

"The new government, which shall assume power immediately, is the Neo-Thomist Catholic, Orthodox, and Reformed Party."

The list of Cabinet Ministers following includes five members of the Anti-Clerical Party's Cabinet, of which Marriott was head. He is now head of the N-TCOR Party.

It also includes a member of the cabinet of the Elizabethan Party Continued, Tim Grew. Other members of the Party are confused by Grew's transferred loyalties, a spokesman said last night.

The EPC is still the official opposition Party in the House.

One Cabinet position in the new government is still not filled. Marriott said it would be a new man, joining the three new members already appointed.

Wycliffe's student government is responsible for decisions on all student matters, including financial.

This marks the first time in history that Wycliffe has had three different governments and three different parties in the course of a year.

MCWA Speaker —

Firm US Action Often Saved West from Reds

Montreal — A former U of T professor last night warned Canada must be realistic about her often frustrating relations with major powers.

Prof. Edgar McInnis, now president of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, was speaking to the opening session of the McGill Conference on World Affairs.

Delegates from 35 Canadian and American universities will discuss Canadian-United States relations during the four-day conference.

Prof. McInnis said Canadians should recognize that firm action on the part of the United States has more than once saved us from Communist domination.

"It seems to me significant that Canadian criticism of American foreign policy is mainly concerned with matters in which Canada herself isn't involved, at least in the first instance," he said.

"That doesn't mean that we don't have a real stake in the decisions. Canada's interests are global, even though her resources are limited," he said.

"We sometimes have to balance the need for harmony against our doubts about the wisdom of American decisions, and in some cases that means accepting a policy that we regard as second-best, but which can be carried out, as against a wiser policy that can't be implemented because the United States won't go along."

Canada has been able to step into a powerful international role as a result of the US commitment to act as a major power, Prof. McInnis said.

In spite of her dependence on the major powers, Canada still has a responsibility to uphold her national interests in every possible way, he said.

Problems arising out of Canadian-US relations are prompted by simultaneous divergent trends, Prof. McInnis said. While the two nations become more and more linked by common interests, they are forever divided by a continuing political separatism, he said.

During the debate a motion by Forestry rep Murray Ross accepting Raisman's proposal was defeated.

- free medical and dental care

Then, on graduating, you will have not only your chosen professional training, but also the prestige of the Queen's Commission as an officer—with the many personal advantages it brings.

University students accepted for ROTP are trained as career officers. However, provision is made for voluntary withdrawal upon completion of three years full duty as a commissioned officer.

A LIMITED NUMBER OF CANADIAN ARMY VACANCIES IN THESE ROTP "UNIVERSITY QUOTAS" ARE STILL AVAILABLE.

SAC Approves New Car Park

The Students' Administrative Council accepted a new money-making parking scheme last night without a murmur.

The plan will provide parking for 160 students until mid-February at a cost of $1 per week, and parking for evening students at 25 cents a night.

Under present plans, cost of levelling the lot north of the Dentistry building and providing a lot attendant will be paid back in revenue within 10 weeks.

Council decided to decide later about a possible refund to students after the capital outlay had been returned.

Profit from evening parking, they decided, will be kept for the general council funds.

Administrative vice-president F. R. Stone, in a letter granting official permission for use of the area by SAC, warned the university reserved the right to "terminate the arrangement on short notice."

The area will be used for new university construction in mid-February, he said, but if construction plans are pushed ahead, "we must not let this temp-up the start of the building."

Students applying for permission to use the new parking lot are accepted on a distance-from-university priority basis.

Bissell Faces Fire

U of T President Claude T. Bissell will face what he terms a "baptism under fire" tonight when he will speak in a Hart House Debate on the question: "The University of Toronto has outgrown its usefulness."

This will mark the first time President Bissell has entered into such a debate. After hearing four principle speakers and speeches from the floor, he will give his opinions in support of one side.

The debate will begin at 8 p.m. in the Debates Room.

Hart House Troubadors Boost Upcoming Concert

Mid-afternoon loungers in the coffee shops of Trinity and University colleges and Hart House stopped their chatter today as an unannounced group of men walked in and burst into the Hart House Alma Mater song.

The group, led by Neil Perkins, OCE, were making the tour from the Buttery to the Junior Common Room to the Arbor Room to publicize the upcoming Hart House tri-university concert of Nov. 22.

After the Alma Mater song, one of the group, drawn from the Hart House Glee Club, made a brief announcement and the minstrels sang their arrangement of "Bonnie Charley" and left.

The University of Rochester Women's Glee Club and the U of T Mixed Chorus will be guests of

The concert is in the Hart House Great Hall at 8:30 p.m. Tickets, costing $1 each, are available from the Hart House hall porters.

The massed choir will sing Gabrielli's "Magnificat" and the Hart House Club has chosen "There is Nothing Like a Dame".

President Won't Hear Liberal Club's Speech

A former Liberal Member of Parliament will speak to the campus Liberal Club tomorrow but the campus Liberal chief will not be there to hear him. Frank Enfield, ex-MP for York - Scarborough, will speak in room 151 of the Economics Building on the proposed CCF-

First vice-president Dick Hamilton has temporarily assumed Doris' duties, Lewis said.

Minister Warns Church, Universities Are Ghettos

A Scots minister yesterday told students he hoped their hearts have not already become abandoned to the cynicism of the 20th century, and the weariness of European countries.

The Rev. Tom Allan addressed a crowded music room in Hart House in the last of a series of noon-hour meetings. He has been on a city-wide mission under the auspices of United, Baptist and Presbyterian churches.

He described the many statues in ancient Athens that were dedicated to the popular gods of the time. But there is one altar inscribed "To the unknown god".

He warned that the Church and universities are a ghetto, where we become divorced from reality.

"The tragedy of man is his inability, by himself to find God. Christ came into the world to show us the heart of God," he said. "Christ came to rescue us from the penalty of our sin. The egotism of man is the sin that separates us from God," he said.

In "moments of truth," when man is in the presence of great beauty, he is filled with an incredible sadness. The Christian believes these experiences are a reflection on the brevity of life and the reality of sin.

"The Kingdom of God is here," he said. "It has come in Christ.

It is not yet perfect, but it is here in pledge and promise."

Only the perpetual dream of an ideal community will perfect this Kingdom. So far in history these dreams have been unrealized. The dreams of Karl Marx resulted in the reality of Russian socialism, he continued.

The advent of Christ assures the true Christian of eternity. He believes there is "something beyond" from the words of one who came back, he said.

CCF Provincial Leader To Spark Club Caucus

Campus CCF president Gerry Caplan said last night plans for the annual CCF campus convention are now in full swing with the procurement of Ontario CCF parliamentary leader Donald A. MacDonald as guest speaker.

"Mr. MacDonald," Caplan said, "is the man who exposed the Frost government's gas scandal resulting in the subsequent retirement of three cabinet ministers."

At the convention, to be held Dec. 3, CCF'ers will select those resolutions which will form the campus CCF platform for the Model Parliament elections. A parliamentary leader will also be elected.

At a club meeting last night, Caplan said, 25 resolutions on national and international affairs were submitted.

home is the gadfly

If it was serious, the attempt to fabricate a tradition for University College by legislating the wearing of gowns is as artificial as the attempt to fabricate a tradition for Canada by legislating a national flag.

For just as the lack of a flag is an integral part of the Canadian tradition; the absence of gowns is a part of UC's.

And there is a tradition at UC. We don't know what the UC motto is (no one seems to) but it might well be "Nothing Sacred."

The value of such a tradition is not, as some think, that of unbridled individualism. But in the value it can have for a whole society that has been badly weaned on the unwholesome milk of its sacred cows.

UC is by no means wholly a college of non-conforming gadflies. But it is a place where the gadfly can fly home to after he has bitten.

Only so long as it remains unfrocked can UC continue to be a haven for the defrocked.

Yugoslavia - V

Djilas: hero or traitor?

By MIKE RASMINSKY

In the last four or five years the name of Milovan Djilas has become very well known in the western world. His criticisms of the Communist system of government have won him the admiration of the West and the comfort of a prison cell somewhere in Yugoslavia. The onetime fair haired boy of the Yugoslav Communist Party is now Public Enemy Number One.

The story of the Djilas affair gives an excellent insight into the theory and practice of Yugoslav Communism and for this reason bears repetition.

Djilas became a Communist early in his youth. In his high school days in Montenegro. At university he was well known as a fiery and passionate Marxist and at the outbreak of the war it was only natural for him to become one of the front rank of the Communist Partisans.

During the war Djilas was one of Tito's closest and most trusted lieutenants. By the end of the war his position as one of the top three or four Communists in Yugoslavia was securely established. After the break with the Russians in 1948 it was Djilas who took the lead in proposing the liberalizing reforms which have come to distinguish Yugoslav Communism or Titoism from Russian Communism. By 1953 Djilas was the crown prince, generally regarded as the most likely successor to Tito.

Late in 1953 Djilas began to publish a series of articles in the Communist party newspaper. These articles attacked bureaucracy and advocated the establishment of greater democracy in Yugoslavia. Superficially these articles said much the same thing as all the other Communist leaders had been saying. At first they excited little interest. However Djilas very soon became more specific and declared that Leninism, still part and parcel of Yugoslav orthodoxy, led inevitably to a form of Stalinism. These later, more critical articles won the enthusiastic support of the party rank and file but the other leaders of the party were somewhat less than enchanted.

It was a difficult position for the Communist leadership. Djilas, the number two man in the party was publishing highly heretical material and receiving the applause of most of the party. What was to be done?

With his final article Djilas solved the problem himself. This article, titled "The Anatomy of Morals", was a biting satire on the closed world of the top Communist officials and the almost caste-like snobishness of the wives of high government and party functionaries. In this article, Djilas summoned his full resources of sarcasm and invective to depict the corruption resulting from power.

Soon afterwards, Djilas was put on trial before a plenum of the Communist party. He was expelled from the Central Committee of the Party and relieved of party functions but was not expelled from the party itself or put into prison. It was not until a good deal later, after he had given interviews to western journalists and published his book "The New Class" in the West, that Djilas was retried and sent to prison.

At present Djilas is a very dirty word in Yugoslavia. Among the hundreds and hundreds of pictures of Tito and the other Communist leaders which we saw, I can only remember seeing one picture of Djilas, a war photograph in a Partisan museum. No one wants to talk about him—to mention Djilas is almost a surefire method of ending a conversation with a Yugoslav. But the short answers which occasionally could be prodded out of Yugoslavs to questions about Djilas were often very instructive.

The position taken by party members is that Djilas was a willful, stupid and ambitious man. He is attacked on grounds of unorthodoxy and his supposed desire to wreck communism or socialism in Yugoslavia.

What I have been trying to show is that it is not only the conduct of the Djilas case, but also the reactions of the people to it that provide important insights into what is going on in Yugoslavia to-day and how the Yugoslav people are thinking.

The impact of Djilas has not yet been completely felt. Yugoslav Communism is largely his brainchild but, like all forms of government, it is evolving very slowly. What Djilas wanted to accomplish in six months or a year will take five, ten or fifteen years. His only crime was in being born ahead of his time. Even though his name is pilloried and vilified in public, a closed edition of his prohibited book, "The New Class", was recently secretly circulated among members of the Communist party. It has, no doubt, made an impression.

Djilas may, yet, in the distant future, again be one of the heroes of Yugoslav Communism.

Education - IV

University: regenerate or relic?

By SAM AJZENSTAT

From November 12 to 14 1956, prominent university educators gathered in Ottawa for a conference on "Canada's Crisis in Higher Education". The proceedings of the conference were later published under the editorship of Claude Bissell, then Carleton University president.

Tomorrow night, exactly two years and one university later, Claude Bissell will be the honorary guest at a Hart House Debate on the motion, "The University of Toronto Has Outlived Its Usefulness".

This article is the fourth in a series on education will attempt to discuss the usefulness of this university under the heading of the papers that were delivered at the Ottawa Conference.

The conference consisted of six sessions, three of which have specific reference to a university's usefulness. These are the sessions on educational structure, technological and scientific education, and the use of human resources.

No one is working to make the university useless as much as expansion. Expansion rears its ugly head in three different parts of the educational structure: (1) the academic structure (2) the administrative structure, and (3) the communications structure.

The danger to the academic structure is more the cause than the effect of that part of expansion which concerns increases in university enrolment. The cause of both is the philosophy of mass education, which, as welcome as it was at the start, is rapidly arriving at a reductio ad absurdum. The source of danger is that the hustling of more and more people into university may subtly change the nature of the university's function into something that emphasizes mass values at the expense of turning out a group of intensely trained specialists.

In Canada, for instance, there are almost no institutions like MIT or Cal Tech in which the greatest emphasis is on specialized professional training. Also we have nothing of the nature of Princeton's Institute for Advanced Study, institutions devoted exclusively to research. And we need these institutions. Expansion must not be allowed to take from the academic structure of

Of course mass education in liberal arts is something that we need just as much. But the answer is not to throw the universities open. As has been already suggested in this series, we can keep the values both of high specialization and mass education by shifting to the secondary schools a good deal of the burden of supplying a high quality liberal education to the great mass of the people, while the universities become almost exclusively the sanctuaries of specialization.

An alternative to this is to make it compulsory for everyone entering university to get a B.A. degree in general arts before being allowed to pass on to highly specialized honors and professional courses.

The crisis of expansion also has ramifications for the administrative structure of universities. The danger is simply that the inevitable and necessary increase in administrative staff with expansion will lead and is now leading to bureaucracy in education. This fear, however, may be exaggerated. In his report to the Ottawa Conference in 1956, Sidney Smith said that "at the present time the universities are far from overweighed on the administrative side. The percentage of total income of Canadian universities that is used for administration is extraordinarily low — 5.5 per cent on the average."

Whether or not this is still the case, the solution to the crisis is not a cutting down on administrative staff and functions. There would be no problem at all if the administration were not an absolutely necessary part of the educational scheme. On the contrary we can welcome the increase in administrative staff "so long as the administrators, new and old", to quote Sidney Smith, remember their function as auxiliary troops assisting the academic staff.

The problem of communications, too, is becoming especially acute. While the increase in students for out-distances the increase in staff, the temptation is great to pass over completely into audio-visual methods of education, methods that utilize films and television for mass education at the cost of personal contact between student and professor. Such personal contact must be maintained for it is in a large part responsible for the great liberalizing influence that forms part of the universities' usefulness. However, impersonal audio-visual methods open out vast possibilities in education and insufficient use of them threatens obsolescence just as much as does too much use of them. What the educators of the near future must achieve is a delicate balance in which both aspects of the educative process can be utilized for maximum effect.

The suggestions that (1) a great part of the burden of liberal education be shifted to the high schools and (2) that a general B.A. can be made compulsory prior to intense specialization, can if operating together do much to alleviate both the danger of overemphasis on either the humanities or scientific technology and the danger of wastage of human resources.

As for the humanities-sciences conflict, implementation of these two suggestions would allow educators to make use of the more and more evident fact that the humanities and the sciences are intimately a part of each other.

Both at the secondary and the general B.A. levels the integration of science and humanities could be emphasized, so that by the time a student passed on to the level of specialization either in humanities or in sciences, he could proceed with a much more active sense of the place his subject occupies in the total realm of knowledge.

In addition these suggestions clear the way for a much more adequate use of human resources. For one thing, if the secondary schools shouldered their share of the burden of liberal education, enrolment in universities could be cut down to a feasible figure without endangering mass education. Also, if the great number of people who come to the university looking not for specialized training but an extension of their liberal education could find what they are looking for in an extended and tightened general arts course, the honour courses could be freed to make maximum use of the human resources that finally passed into them.

Is Pirandello a sometime Shavian, tossing his chips of wisdom, wit and whoopla with well timed dashing aplomb? Pirandello: How He Wood Her Ding Dong; What Every Ding Dong Should; Arms and The . . .

Is this Pirandello? Intellectual. Coolly declining body taints. Getting the "ideas" across? You must get the message. The philo- content.

No, this is not Pirandello.

Pirandello is emotion. Melodramatic bravura. Rich, rising, resonant tensions that crackle and rush from the belly, ladies. Not the nervous system, sir. The belly. Not the skin, nor the cranium. Not even the adenoids. The belly. Straight from the crotch, sir. With conviction.

And this is what was missing from the Coach House Theatre's production of, As You Desire Me. Guts.

Pirandello should grip you by the throat with one hand and the belly with the other and rattle hell into you. And gasping, exhausted, all sweaty you pick yourself up and shake calm back into your body. Shock! The ideas. Someone has transplanted some elaborate Pirandello ideas into you. Shock!

And good thespians, particularly Kenneth Pogue (Bruno), Ivor Jackson (Salter) and Marian Stewart (Elma-Cia), emotions are not the muscles of your throat, the twitching of your eyes and fingers. Nor can they be conveyed by tossing off line in measures and letting volume and pitch rise and fall with shrewd anticipation. Nor the rhetorical bluster of stiff necked regimental sergeants.

Emotions should flow. Not splinter, snap, crackle, pop like highly nervous breakfast cereals. Emotions should bathe the audience. Not make them cringe and crickle in their seats as if a horse comb was being dragged down their backs. Emotions have to pass through the belly, not the brain.

Whose fault? The actors? The director's? A misinterpretation of Pirandello? The Canadian way of life? Protestant ethic? Anglo-Saxon manners? Lack of liquor? Lack of sex?

Frustration and emotional fatigue; I, with the rest of the audience after the first big act, emotional crisis clapped nervously, rose quietly and went into the hallway to smoke a cigarette and make trivial and pleasant remarks. And feel embarrassed. Not one person of all the ones I saw were swept away. Not one showed the flush of emotional involvement. Not one. And this well laid out little theatre held only 51 people. Isn't that incredible. Not one emotionally involved. And such a small theatre.

But of course they knew completely what Pirandello's ideas were.

Whose fault? The actors? The director's? The reviewer's? The audience's? All so apathetically Canadian and damn pleasantly civilized and all that.

From the opening scene, that play should have moved powerfully, violently to its majestic and tragic denouement. When the young drunkards come into the Salter flat, the streets, its smells and sounds should have spilled in with them and shocked us with its violence, corruption and decay.

Sets, costumes, lighting, general staging was good.

This is a brilliant but most difficult play and Elizabeth Gray, director and Marian Stewart, I congratulate for a most determined effort. This group, the University Alumnae, should be supported with fervor by all. We are very lucky to have such people.

Next, I hear is Lorca's Yerma. I will cross my fingers.

THE MAKE-UP TEAM prepares the UC Follies cast for dress rehearsal. Opening tonight, the Follies run until Saturday.

On n'a pas badine...

...avec Musset

Theatrical productions at any time are a risky business, but the element of risk involved is magnified tenfold when the production is in a foreign language, or perhaps I should say in a language other than English (this being officially a bilingual land). Tuesday night's production at Hart House of Musset's "On ne badine pas avec l'amour" ran this risk, and only just survived.

Le Cercle Français de University College perhaps made their greatest error in their choice of play, for Musset's tragic-comedy would present any theatrical company with a difficult task. The play is typical of the Romantic dramas, with its mixture of 'genres', sentimentality and melodramatic elements. Its very form and content make it a problem to handle when it comes to putting it on stage, and it does not easily appeal to the audiences of today. The play itself is concerned with a pair of star-crossed lovers, who in their quest for each other destroy a third.

However UC made an admirable attempt to overcome these difficulties, and the production was saved from defeat by the performances of the two leading roles, upon whom the success of the play relied to a great extent.

A M

Both Ross Curtis and Erika Hiron had mastered the essence of their roles, an dthe fluency of their French did much to add to the quality of their performances. Ross Curtis played Perdicus, the love-sick hero, with conviction and feeling, and his polished performance only tended, unfortunately, to show up the inadequacies of his fellow players. As Camille, Erika Hiron took a while to relax, but then settled down to fulfil the role of Musset's heroine. Dame Pluche, played by Milada Tiesnak, retained her oppressive saintliness to the end, and these three actors kept the play together and alive.

The other characters, however, failed to do justice to their roles, and often missed the essence of Musset's comic relief. This was especially evident in the case of the two friars who could have made so much more of their parts, and should have brought out all the comedy that Musset obviously intended for them. Their grimaces and movements often tended to become too grotesque. Le Baron (Chris Gellinek) was too conscious of speaking French on stage; his replies were forced and sometimes badly timed. This same fault occurred in Sylvia Karwaser's Rosette. She was a delightful looking young woman in her little purple costume, but she failed to convince us that she was really deeply in love with Perdicus, betraying no emotional attachment to the hero, the pathos of her situation was lost, and thus her final suicide scene was hardly credible. A distressing role of the evening was that of the tempter Rozalyn Palef seemed to have her job cut out for her, and was fully occupied.

The sets designed by Dave Ross were simple, and highly effective. The director, had manipulated the actors in such a way as to use the set to its full advantage.

Despite these general findings, the production as a whole enabled us to have a pleasant evening of French entertainment, and to enjoy a good laugh. We came away feeling satisfied, with a feeling of admiration for UC's Cercle Français, who had so bravely attempted this difficult play. The quality of French spoken was surprisingly high, and it was a treat for our ears to enjoy two hours of our other language for a change. It was only to be regretted that a larger audience was not to be seen in what this reviewer has been assured is the cultural capital of Canada.

Fischer - Dieskau With TSO

On Tuesday and Wednesday nights, guest artist Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau was presented at the second pair of concerts in the Toronto Symphony Orchestra subscription series at Massey Hall. However, the performance, consisting of works by Bach, Vaughan Williams, Mahler, and Haydn, was not altogether a pleasing presentation.

The first selection, the Kreuzstabtante by Bach, was interpreted rather feebly by Mr. Fischer-Dieskau. The predominantly string accompaniment was very resonant and lovely, but the singer could hardly be heard. Perhaps the acoustics at the sides of the auditorium are relatively poor in comparison to the reception of sound at the center and back. However, the fact remains that the young baritone was trained to sing leader to the accompaniment of one or two instruments, but not to the great many instruments which were actually used in the performance. That fact might explain his apparent lack of projection. Mr. Fischer-Dieskau seemed to have a very pleasant, resonant voice when the orchestra was subdued to its softest tones, but for the greater part of the selection the singer seemed to be subordinated to his accompaniment.

The Ninth Symphony by Vaughan Williams was also somewhat of a disappointment, at least to those who, being accustomed to the classical tradition, have not yet got used to modern music. To me, at any rate, it seemed to be not much more than organized cacophony; however, the pros and cons of classical vs. modern music will never be entirely reconciled. It is a moot question, for one's tastes in this regard are simply matters of opinion.

Mahler's Kindertotenlieder was the second selection chosen by Mr. Fischer-Dieskau.

This set of five songs was an improvement on the performance of the Bach, perhaps because the tone of the orchestra was softened on account of the poignant theme: The pieces summarize five reactions to death in childhood and inspire an attitude of tender pity.

The London Symphony by Haydn helped to change the generally serious atmosphere to a lighter mood. For one thing, it is certainly much more melodious than the symphony by Vaughan Williams, and it has more variety of modulation than the Bach. Although serious at the beginning the symphony was predominantly joyful, and the tones were well blended to emphasize the theme of the several movements. This concluding selection somewhat made up for the other defects of the program.

Protest Mount 'Master Speaks

Student protests continue to mount daily across Canada at the recent firing of three editors of University of Ottawa's newspaper—La Rotonde.

Latest objection has come from McMaster University's students' council which has sent a letter protesting the dismissal of Louis Cliche, Roger Roy and Pierre Trudel from their editorial posts on the Ottawa paper.

The letter reads: "The Students' Council of McMaster University protests the action of the administration of the University of Ottawa in dismissing the three editors of La Rotonde without first consulting the Student Federation."

McMaster council president Thomas Ryan said the letter had been forwarded to the three editors, Nfcsu president, Canadian University Press president and students' councils of all Ontario and Quebec universities.

Other official protests have been sent from students' councils at U of T and the University of Montreal, Canadian University Press, national Nfcsu office, Ontario and Quebec branches of Nfcsu and various student papers.

Viewsweek

Just another reminder that indications are Newsbeef was right in what it said last night about a big party this weekend for Varsity higher-ups.

But inside sources say the higher-ups want junior executives along too, and that includes almost anyone.

Don't be surprised if it turns out to be the party of the year, even with elections and all.

Dean Tells Club Canada's Economic Policy Outdated

A U of T economics professor yesterday blasted Canadian trade policy as "rooted in an 80-year-old tariff tradition that threatens the country's prosperity."

Speaking to the campus United Nations Club on "Canada's Economic Policy", University College dean of men Ian Macdonald called for a freer Canadian trade policy "that will transcend interests of nationalism and individual groups."

Dean Macdonald said Canada's failure to participate in free trade has reduced the effectiveness of our economic leadership, ideas and policies throughout the world.

"The tying down of over 60 per cent of our foreign trade with United States concerns is a grave mistake which is hampering the nation's economic growth," he warned.

The Dean said it would seem Canada at the present either lacks the aggressive leadership or the desire "to disengage itself from reliance on U.S. trade and tone down its tariff laws."

Referring to the newly-created European Common market and South American markets, he said these countries offer the country "vast opportunities to leave the American trade orbit and follow a more independent economic policy."

"As a member of the European trading-block Canada could exercise a more influential voice in world economic policies than it is now doing," he added.

Calling this his "Machiavellian theory", he foresaw eventual reduction of the high American tariffs if Canada switched to free trade.

Stressing protective tariffs have hitherto been basic to the country's economy, Dean Macdonald said this shows either Canadians can not stand on their own feet or they are "backing the wrong horse in national development."

"Until we let these horses free on the world market it will be impossible to find out if they are worth riding or not," he said.

He advocated Canada gear its economy toward the industry and production most suitable to the country. Citing Nova Scotia coal mining as one of the Canadian industries with little potential, he said the transfer of these miners to new and more basic industries would be costly but in the long run would benefit the nation.

He said lukewarm reaction to U.K. proposals for freer trade points out "the curious fact the government is more interested in its own industry than foreign trade."

The country must be "willing to hurt national parties in the alteration on its economic structure or face a prodigious loss in foreign and domestic prestige," he said.

To Fete Star Veteran Nite For Red Stephen

David H. "Red" Stephen, the most colorful player ever to perform in a Varsity hockey uniform, will be honored with his own "night" when Blues entertain University of Michigan Wolverines here December 1.

The special event is being produced by The Varsity sports department in co-operation with the hockey team and the University of Toronto Athletic Association. Sports Editor John Brooks, chairman of "Red Stephen Night," said last night that plans to honor the "old redhead" have been in the formulative stages for some time, and "we expect it will be an event to remember."

Varsity athletic director Warren Stevens will present Stephen with a miniature replica of the Queen's Cup, emblematic of Intercollegiate hockey supremacy, in a between-periods ceremony.

The Varsity band and cheerleaders are expected to attend the game, along with what athletic officials hope will be one of the largest hockey crowds in recent years.

The game itself, pitting the National College Athletic Association runners-up against Varsity's defending champion Blues, is the first International Intercollegiate game to be played here in 10 years.

Until 1949, Varsity, McGill, Queen's and Laval competed with four Ivy League colleges—Harvard, Princeton, Dartmouth and Yale.

Financial difficulties forced the league to disband in 1949. Queen's dropped out of the league soon afterwards, with University of Montreal Carabins taking their place.

Wolverines are making a tour of eastern Canada and the United States, and play their final game here Monday, December 1. It will be Blues' first home college start of the year. They open their regular schedule against Laval and McGill the previous weekend.

For Red Stephen, December 1 will be a big night.

As well as the special tribute that will be paid him, he embarks on his eighth year with U of T, the last four of which have seen him on an Intercollegiate champion team.

A graduate of Harbord Collegiate Institute, Stephen played with Ayr Raiders of the Scottish Hockey League before enrolling in Physical and Health Education here in 1951.

He played centre with Varsity until 1954, when he was switched to defence, a position he has held ever since, although still taking an occasional whirl at the forward wall.

In his Varsity career, Red has scored 20 goals and 59 assists in league play, for a total of 79 points. He was captain of the champion teams of 1954-55, 1955-56 and 1956-57.

Interfaculty Summary

Victoria Seconds defeated First Pre-Meds, 4-2, in the other lacrosse encounter. Simpson led the winners with two, and Shield and Coupland added one each. Deptrillo counted twice for the Doctors.

In senior soccer play, St. Mike's A and Senior SPS battled to a scoreless tie. Volleyball activity saw Junior Skule whip St. Mike's, 15-1, 15-9.

In squash play, University College Thirds edged St. Mike's B, 2-1, with Victoria upending Architecture by the same margin.

Trinity Finishes Schedule Defeats St. Mikes 20-6 Playoffs To Begin Monday

By DAVE GRINER
Varsity Staff Reporter

Trinity Black Panthers finished the intramural football season undefeated as they whipped St. Mikes 20-6 on the back campus yesterday.

Taking a 7-0 lead at half time, the Panthers scored another major in the third quarter and then stood off a late rally by the Irish to win going away.

Rusty Dunbar's first quarter TD, which was converted by Peter Eby, provided Trinity with their first half margin, and then Dave Tavender took a pass from quarterback Brook Ellis in the third quarter to up the margin to thirteen points.

St. Mike's scored in the first five minutes of the last quarter. Ed Gabis broke through and intercepted an Ellis pass and then ran 18 yards for the major. The convert was no good.

Trinity roared right back, however, and Dana Smith took a pass from Ellis to cap off a long march. Eby converted.

The game was hard fought all the way, and was in doubt until Smith counted the last Trinity major.

By winning, Trinity obviated the necessity of a replay of the postponed game with Vic. Even if Vic was to win it, they could not finish in first place as the Panthers have a three point lead.

FOOTBALL PIC

The Senior Football team will have their picture taken today. Players are requested to meet at Varsity Stadium promptly at 1 o'clock.

Swimmers Prepare For Rugged Season

Varsity's defending champion swim Blues, chasing their second Intercollegiate title, open season competition Friday night in Hart House with an intra-squad meet.

And one week from Friday — November 21 — Etobicoke Memorial Aquatic Club, one of Canada's finest swim organizations, move into Hart House for what should be a fine meet.

Olympic gold medalist Bill Yorzyk, who has taken over head coaching reins from Cressy McCatty this year, is optimistic for his Blues' chances, despite the loss of freestyler Larry Freeman.

Freeman has enrolled at Western, but is ineligible for college competition this year. Also missing from last year's team is butterfly ace Doug McCulloch.

Four newcomers out at practices have pleased Coach Yorzyk, and Bill is confident he can mold a champion from returning material and his quartet of rookies.

Backstroke Bob Fisher, one of Toronto's top interscholastic swimmers last season, will join captain John Ridpath as Blues' backstroke punch.

Other newcomers are John Deacon, a breaststroker from Upper Canada College, backstroker Nick Thierry, who swam with Etobicoke last year, and Hamiltonian Mike MacLachan, a distance and sprint man.

Diving coach Stu McSweeney, who lost Ted Belman and George Huovinen — second and third respectively in Intercollegiate finals last year — has a "greatly improved" Dave Harvey back, and welcomed newcomers Bill Sims and Ed Logan.

Looking ahead, Coach Yorzyk has tabbed Western as the team to beat. Mustangs have aces Pete Fowler, Pete Bell and Denis Svetko back in efforts to regain the title.

McGill, the only other college competing in senior swimming, once again bases its hopes on young Cameron Grout, probably the outstanding Canadian swimmer of the day.

Varsity Hosts Harrier

In the Eastern Canadian Harrier Championships held at Guelph last Saturday, Toronto came home behind teams from OAC, Queen's and Western, while beating a week McGill crew. Don Beil of Toronto broke into the first ten, finishing seventh.

Individual results: Don Bell 7; Roy Price 13; Michael Berger 16; Jan Roos 18; Hugh Gordon 20.

This Saturday at 3 p.m. in High Park, Toronto Varsity will try to come up with a win in an exhibition run against Niagara.

Indoor track starts this Thursday at Hart House at 5 p.m. Fred Foot the coach will be there Tuesdays and Thursdays until Christmas.

At the first meeting today, the executive for indoor track are to be elected. Highlights of the year are trips to Michigan State and Buffalo after Christmas.

A limited number of lockers are available. For these contact Michael Berger.

AWAY WE GO—Varsity's new swim coach Bill Yorzyk, who won a gold medal in the 1956 Olympic Games, shows ex-swim coach Gressy McCatty his style when Bill arrived on campus last season. This year, Yorzyk will coach as well as swim, with McCatty stepping out of the picture.

Forestry All-Male, Still Fun

Through halls paneled with knotty pine, yellow birch, beech and black cherry, the 80-odd students of Forestry may be found clomping about in bush boots and green windbreakers.

In this, one of the lesser known faculties on campus, enrollment is growing by leaps and bounds, and now in its 51st year, Forestry boasts a record freshmen class of 24.

A typical Forestry student appears to be the healthy, outdoor type who wishes to avoid being stuck behind a desk all his life. But Dean J. W. Sisam had some remarks recently that show there are two sides to the course.

"The average Forester may have an aversion to desk-work, but he will still have to spend about one half of his time in the field and one half in the office," he said.

Perhaps it is the rugged, outdoor aspect though, that discourages women from the course. There have been few applicants and no graduates at the faculty in Toronto.

"I wouldn't discourage any girl who is sincerely interested," Dean Sisam said. "But I hope, to avoid obvious difficulties on field trips, that she isn't the only one in her class."

research, one graduate student said Canada's forest resources, unlike coal and ore, are renewable. The great demands on pulp, paper and timber will soon sap this resource, and research is the only way to discover stronger and faster-growing strains of trees.

During his undergraduate days, a forestry student gets a fair-sized glimpse of his future in the great outdoors. Every spring, all students go on a month-long field trip to the 17,000-acre University forest near Dorset.

Here at the Forest Rangers' School they get practical experience in surveying, soil study, forest planning and management.

As part of their training, students take summer jobs in some field of work. The jobs are well-paid by the government as well as being excellent experience.

section of Ontario's northland where he would be responsible for wildlife management, fire protection and land allotment.

He can teach, work with the Department of Lands and Forests or the Department of Planning. In addition, many industrial jobs are now open to him as companies begin to realize the value of forest management in their economy.

A graduate can enter the research station at Glendon Hall where studies of forest genetics, ecology and effects of environment on tree growth are being conducted.

Pointing out the value of this

At the beginning of this century, Canada and the U.S. were discovering that the industrial revolution had put increasing pressure on forest resources. In spite of all the wood available, some states in the U.S. were cutting faster than they were replacing.

Realizing the need for wise management of the Canadian forests, U of T set up Canada's first forestry school in 1907. Today it plays a role of even greater importance in our country's expanding economy.

AVR Gets Moivng....

The All-Varsity Revue takes on the trappings of reality tonight as auditions for the cast of 50 open at 7.30 p.m. in the Howard Ferguson Hall basement.

The two-act original bookshow has 15 speaking roles and a chorus of 40 men and women.

The show is set in Rome, 58 A.D., and concerns Emperor Nero's attempts to put down a plot against his throne led by conspiring senators.

AVR officials hope a large number of hopefuls will try out for the show. "The more who try out for it, the better chance we have of having an excellent cast," Producer Bill Lord said last night.

There has been no advance casting for the show, Lord said.

Will Meet Student Reps

MONTREAL—CUP—It's taken nearly eight months but student presidents of Quebec's six universities have finally been granted an interview with Provincial Premier Maurice Duplessis.

In a letter yesterday to Roy Heenan, President of the McGill Students' Society, Mr. Duplessis set Dec. 2 as the date for an exclusive interview with the six students to discuss overall financial aid to universities and statutory education grants.

He was replying to a joint letter Nov. 10 from the student presidents requesting a meeting to clarify financial matters.

Duplessis said he would "be pleased to grant the interview requested by the president who signed this joint letter at the earliest possible date... that is to say, Dec. 2 to 10 a.m. in my office in the Parliament Buildings in Quebec".

An earlier interview is impossible, Duplessis said, "due to the very pressing demands upon my time on the eve of the opening of our parliamentary session".

Last March nearly 20,000 students from five Quebec universities boycotted lectures to protest the Premier's refusal to receive a delegation of student presidents.

Later a self-appointed group known as the University Action League presented a brief to Duplessis and was granted an interview although they did not specifically demand one.

The group, which has no connection with the students' councils of Quebec universities, is believed to have been granted concessions by the Premier which will be announced at the parliamentary session opening this month.

Students slated to meet the Premier next month will represent McGill, Sherbrooke, Montreal, Sir George Williams, Bishop's and Laval Universities.

Three Governments Down Not One To Go At Wycliffe

Wycliffe college, which has had three governments within the space of a week, is today without one of any nature.

Leader of the third government to assume power within the week, John Marriott, forestalled an impending vote of non-confidence in his government by resigning last night before the vote could be taken.

Marriott made the announcement last night in a special meeting of the Wycliffe House, called after a petition signed by 24 members expressing their lack of confidence in the new regime had been presented to Governor-General Charles Ledger.

The official opposition party, the Elizabethan Party Continued, also announced its resignation at last night's session of the House.

Following the resignations, Governor-General Ledger issued a proclamation officially dissolving this session of the Wycliffe Literary Society.

"Due to the apparent inability of any party to form a stable government in this House, and to the fact that there is no leader of the Opposition, I hereby dissolve the present session of the Wycliffe College Literary Society," Ledger said.

Ledger also ordered a general election to be held between noon and 1.45 p.m. on Nov. 23.

During the two weeks interval, the ordinary business of the Society will be attended to by the four permanent officers, the proclamation continued.

The four are: W. Moore, treasurer; A. Rix, SAC rep; E. Boun-sail, social director and Governor-General Charles Ledger.

Slates of officers for Cabinet positions must be submitted to the four officers for approval not later than four p.m. Tuesday, Nov. 25th.

The proclamation specified that no campaigning may be carried out prior to the special election, but slates of officers, once they have been approved by the four permanent officers, may be posted on the Literary Society's bulletin board.

Platforms of the approved candidates may also be posted on the bulletin board.

"The no electioneering rule is being applied here because this is a special election which is not covered by our Constitution," Charles Testart, Keeper of the Seal in the old House, said last night.

The Discipline Committee of the Literary Society was out dissolved and Ledger's proclamation said "no resignations from it shall be accepted until after the general election takes place."

Wycliffe's political pains developed last Monday night when the government, the Anti-Clerical party, was overthrown on a motion of non-confidence.

Only fourteen members, a bare quorum of the House's more than 80 members, were present at Monday's meeting.

Over 45 were in the House for last night's session.

This is the first time in history that Wycliffe students have overthrown three governments in one year.

Wycliffe's student government is responsible for decisions on all student affairs, including financial matters.

Sneak Peek, Rush For All, At Skule Nite

Plans for a "bigger and better" Skule Nite '59 will include a sneak preview of the show, engineering officials said last night.

Producer Karl Harries said the annual review is in condition for an advance staging Monday night, and rush tickets will be made available to all students in Hart House theatre Monday.

They will sell for a reduced rate of $1.

Harries said seats for regular performances Thursday, Friday and Saturday night are almost sold out, but first year engineering students will have a chance to get tickets today.

"Skule Nite this year will be better than last's", Toike Oike, engineering student periodical reported in this week's issue.

"The scripts are better, the scenes are quicker, shorter, snappier. There is more polish to the show with better humor", the paper continued.

baptism of fire

Humanities Still Useful—Bissell

U of T President Claude T. Bissell stuck up for his university last night and won.

Honorary visitor at last night's Hart House debate, Dr. Bissell spoke against the motion "The University of Toronto has outgrown its Usefulness". The resolution was thrown out by a vote of 35-45.

Undergoing what he has called his "baptism of fire" at the House, Dr. Bissell said it is impossible the U of T will outgrow its usefulness as it "contains within itself the sources of its own vitality."

Supporting the resolution were J. W. Daly (SGS) and T. M. McNulty (I SMC), while W. D. Shaw (IV UC) and D. P. Rutenberg (II SPS) argued on the side of the president.

Daly said he opposed the U of T "more in sorrow than in anger." The university, he said, should produce "an educated man", "a humble boy", "one who reveres the past", "a Tory".

What the U of T does produce, Daly said, is "an intellectual".

"Intellectual is a fine adjective but a poor noun," he said. An intellectual is one who judges the world by "the puny standards of dignity of being tabulated by an IBM machine."

"No man can think for himself." If the university hopes to perform even a minimum of its purpose, he said, the university should expel all women and "take the physical sciences and deposit them somewhere out in Etobicoke."

The West, he said, is losing the Cold War because "liberals" are doing too much soulsearching and we lack the conviction that "we are the good guys and they are the bad guys."

Shaw retorted the U of T incorporates "the best of two possible worlds," the advantages of the large college and the small college, because of the federated system.

The U of T, Shaw said, has "a unity which not only does not exclude but actually encourages individuality."

The university, he said, "not only imparts knowledge but imparts it imaginatively." Lecturers who make the "letter kill the spirit are few and far between."

Defending the motion, McNulty cited this is the first year the U of T student must suffer "the in-humanities are "the heart of the university." He cited "the concept that the best training for a profession is intellectual concern in one area."

The U of T, he said, is "the glory of the city."

About 100 people attended the debate.

He cited the facilities of the university, such as a wind tunnel capable of producing air-streams of 25 times the speed of sound and an atomic reactor.

Dr. Bissell said "bigness" is one of the emotionally-clad words that get in the way of clear thought.

"We look back upon the small town with a sort of pathetic romanticism," he said.

This is not a unitary university," he said. "It is based upon the very principle of federalism."

Dr. Bissell said, "We have a closer student-staff relationship than in any other university in Canada."

He defended professional courses, "No longer is it possible to speak of universities as preparation for a life of gentility."

But Dr. Bissell still believes the humanities are "the heart of the

"Whether sack or suit, you may be a sheep!"

Since women have taken to wearing sacks, men have smugly accepted the new shape as further evidence that women follow the dictates of fashion like sheep. Every few months they adopt a new silhouette and a new wardrobe.

On the other hand, women declare it's the men who are the real sheep. Not only do they conform to a rigid style, but they haven't made a significant change in their wardrobes for two generations—still the same stiff collars, neutral colours and sedate cuffs.

Who's the sheep? Neither, in my opinion. It makes good sense to keep up to date, while keeping the basic things that time has proven worthy. Look at insurance. North American Life & Casualty has a pattern for confident living designed to keep pace with the constant changes in your everyday life. Yet the flexible plans are cut from the basic fabric of security that never goes out of style.

Measure your insurance needs for today and tomorrow. Whether it's life insurance, sickness, education, or retirement income, there's a NALAC plan to fit you. Call us for details, won't you?

The Varsity - a weekend review

et incarnatus

In developing a theory of literary criticism grounded in a deep study of ritual and myth, Victoria College's Professor H. Northrop Frye has become something of a myth himself, grand and unapproachable. This week the Word became flesh when Professor Frye appeared in the midst of the faithful at the Vic Liberal Arts Club to give a talk on "The War and Peace of Words."

Semantics, however, only provided a framework in which Professor Frye developed his ideas of the function of fine arts in a liberal education.

"Ritual, the anthropologists tell us precedes myth," he said. "We perform a ritual action first and then we make up a myth to explain why we are performing it. That is why students come to university first and have heated discussions about why they came afterwards. Coming to university is a ritual. We come simply because it is there. Afterwards we make up myths to explain our coming."

By SAM AJZENSTAT

The myth however often leads us to expect the university to do things for us that are not a part of its function. In order to discover what the function of education actually is, Frye explained a dichotomy in the personality of university students.

"One part of the personality is the social or intellectual ego. This is the part of us that conforms, that wants to be accepted. It is especially susceptible to advertising and similar propaganda because it regards everything subjectively, with reference to itself."

Study of art and sciences, however, brings another part of the personality into play. This is the impersonal part. Because it does not think of everything with reference to itself, it can rise to an vision of higher values, values embodied in the illuminations of genius and sanctity.

"The characteristic of second-rate art is the intrusion into it of the personality of the artist. But in the works of the greatest artists, such as Mozart and Bach, the work reaches a level of impersonality into which the personality of the artist does not intrude." It is from works of art such as these that the illumination of a higher realm of values comes.

However, with his intellectual ego devoting itself to the values of the world as it is, while the impersonal part comes to an understanding of the world as it should be, an inevitable gap opens out between the two worlds.

It is the purpose of education to open out this gap. As it opens the true student becomes dissatisfied with the world as is and strives toward the world as should be.

Education must foster the gap and the consequent dissatisfaction. "To make people maladjusted is the purpose of education."

More maladjusted than ever before, the initiated and the uninitiated alike settled down to coffee, cookies, and informal discussion.

two at the gca

"A graphic artist has to work within society's frame of reference, and in so doing his design becomes a mirror of his audience and his time." Allan Fleming, describing his own graphics, now at the Gallery of Contemporary Art, has underestimated the effect of good design.

Good design, such as Fleming's, does more than mirror society. It sets a standard of taste and even educates society.

The exhibition of his typography at the GCA is excellently displayed. Handbills, personal greeting cards, menus, exhibition announcements, letterheads and book jackets—all are really good. Some designs are bold, some fine. Fleming has varied his layout, choice of fonts, colors and paper to accord perfectly with the subject matter and purpose of his announcement. And more, each design pleases on its own.

William Koochin, a Vancouver artist whose works have not been seen in Toronto before, is the second exhibitor at the GCA. Working in a medium that requires meticulous handling, Koochin has produced several small sculptures that are at first examination, very attractive.

The medium is welded steel. Koochin has welded small, irregularly shaped plates of steel into the fairly realistic shapes of cocks, cockerels, cats and a peacock. Most of these are decorated with cloisonné enamel.

There are in addition, two small figurines, a standing and a seated woman. The seated woman is less realistic. Using the angular shapes of the steel plates, Koochin has shaped these figures according to a sort of voluminous cubism.

Artists such as Gerald Gladstone, who used welded steel for open, linear skeletal effects, seem to be more successful in this medium. Koochin has had difficulty controlling the overall shape of his pieces, built up as they are from small metal scraps.

The best pieces show Koochin's sense of color and pattern decoration. The surface texture of the cloisonné, and the mosaic of the plates are the most pleasing aspects of his work. Janet MacDonald.

I BEG TO DIFFER

I feel strongly that a post script should be added to yesterday's article entitled "Fischer-Dieskau with TSO," which so glibly dismissed the performance of Vaughan Williams' Ninth symphony in one short paragraph, the reviewer serving us up with the plaintive excuse that she 'had not yet got used to modern music'. What a philistine! how could she be so deaf or narrow-minded as to describe these new and exciting sounds and melodies as mere organized cacophony? Indeed her attitude was typical of the mass of socialite music lovers (?), who grace Massey Hall with their presence to hear the TSO; they too sat like sheep, determined not to suffer or listen to this contemporary work which might jar on their ears — for they have been told that modern music is rather non-you — only the old classics can be enjoyed, and anyway how could they begin to appreciate a work which they wouldn't have heard beforehand on the hi-fi (I should say stereo hi-fidelity) in their drawing-rooms. Their response (or I should say absence of response) to the performance was a disgrace, for the TSO's rendering was brilliant, and was without doubt the highlight of the evening.

To hear this new symphony was, to put it mildly, an exhilarating and inspiring experience, which was increased twofold on a second hearing. Obviously the symphony is modern as it was only finished last year, yet how it differs from the mass of modern 'classical' compositions that we have had to suffer during the last few years. Here at last is progress. For Vaughan Williams in his explorations has discovered radical new musical horizons. He himself tells us in his introduction to this work that he is experimenting with his orchestra, using new instruments such as the fluegel horn and the saxophone, which no longer sound like 'demented cats', but are allowed to be their romantic selves'.

It is only to be regretted that the composer should have died just at a time when his latest work showed such promising developments; let us hope that of our modern budding composers will take up where he left off.

Today the traditional concept of nationalism is rapidly degenerating into a cheap emotion open to exploitation by commercial opportunists and third-rate powers.

There is nothing much wrong with nationalism itself. It is merely a refined version of the old human urge to run with the pack.

Throughout man's history the packs with which he runs have grown steadily larger. Tribal bands have given way to city states and from city states have developed sovereign states, commonwealths, nations and alliances of nations.

Man's allegiance has shifted with each development.

Today we have virtually reached the penultimate stage in this evolution. Today, whether we want to be realistic about it or not, man owes his first allegiance not to Canada, not to Britain, not to the United States nor Russia, but to the East or the West.

Man has in fact, only two choices left.

With this situation in front of us, nationalism begins to lose its point.

There are, admittedly, a vast number of countries who are beginning to feel their oats, who are bathing in the warm, satisfying radiance of a hard-won independence, and who demand the right to assert themselves before the rest of the world.

Such assertions, although frequently noisy and often annoying, are both understandable and—in the long run—harmless.

Canada is not such a country.

Canada has been a nation for more than 75 years and back in the days when it meant something to be a nation, succeeded in making her position clear.

Unfortunately as the Cold War developed Canada's wealth and importance, Canada's arrogance seems to have developed with it.

We have reached a stage today when every medium of our communication, every ounce of our art and most aspects of our education are devoted to the cause of selling Canada to Canadians.

We know we are Canadian. We could hardly be allowed to forget it. We understand what it means to strike Canadian-made matches, to light Canadian-made cigarettes wrapped in Canadian-made packages printed in Canada.

We understand the pride and prestige that go with a Canadian flag and a Canadian national anthem.

We can appreciate the over-powering significance of reading all the great Canadian novels and watching the great Canadian plays.

And above all we can win with true nationalistic pride when foreign countries carve inroads into our culture and make us realize just how hollow is the drum we beat so loudly.

But we have also come to the conclusion that it isn't really that important.

Nationalism is the most rousing game there is and, before the days of television, one of man's most amusing preoccupations. It kept him happy for centuries.

But when children become men, they speak as men and put away childish things.

Canada should pause in her perpetual twilight and grasp the fact that the rest of the world is now playing for keeps.

Education—V

The Summing Up

By SAM AJZENSTAT

When the series on education began, we promised that in the last article we would return to Utopia to consider the ideal system of education. We cannot return to Utopia simply because, as the series turned out, we never left.

This is no accident. It reflects the kind of thing that is being said at conference after conference on every aspect of our educational structure; there is much talk about what improvements must be made in our system and very little talk about how.

But at the present stage of our educational self-consciousness this is perhaps a good thing.

There is still much that we can learn about method by simple trial and error, and only after a much larger accumulation of records of success and failure of the teacher in the classroom has been laid down will there be much point in calling conferences to discuss the how of education.

Whereas records of success and failure in method are still scant in this country, records of the success and failure of aims and ideals have been accumulating in all spheres of life since the birth of our civilization and now bear critical examination.

Methods will have to spend some time in the classroom before they can be brought to the conference table, but aims and ideals must be examined at the conference table before they can be brought into the classroom.

This is why the great majority of the words used at educational conferences are words that have yet to acquire any clear-cut meaning. Only by constant discussion of the ideals we are striving for will they ever acquire such meaning.

And this is also why this article will attempt to bring together all the utopian suggestions that have been made in this series, even though some of them may appear meaningless in the context of the present educational structure.

In public school two elements will be stressed: (a) fundamental techniques such as the traditional three R's, (b) the excitement inherent in the learning process.

The pupil will spend less time than he does at present in primary school, perhaps only five years, but they will be the most important five years of his educational life, for on the public school will rest almost the entire responsibility for instilling the desire to learn.

At this level the progressivists should have the upper hand. Except for the basic skills, the acquisition of knowledge should mean practically nothing. It is not tender-minded sentimentalism but tough-minded pragmatism to expect that the emphasis in public school should be, first and foremost, on fun, and, only after this, on knowledge.

For this reason the curriculum of the public school will be highly informal; there will be no hard and fast list of facts that have to be absorbed. Instead the teacher will teach anything and everything for which he can find or make a natural opening in the minds of his pupils.

If the interests of pure intellectual stimulation can be better served by a primary education devoted entirely to finger painting and listening to music, so be it. If on the other hand a precocious student asks for the theory of relativity in kindergarten that too should be available.

But in primary school nature of the facts that are being absorbed must remain subordinate to the fact that something, almost regardless of what, is flowing between pupil and teacher.

However, by the time the student gets into, say, grade six, this kind of picnic should be over. This is the period of what is called the junior high school. The period between grade six and eight also has a double function:

(a) it must involve a subtle transition between the simple excitement of learning anything to the more complex excitement of learning specific facts, according to a much more inflexible curriculum.

(b) it must provide a sufficiently general picture of the field of knowledge as to give the pupil some background for making a choice in grade eight between the academic, the vocational, and the commercial secondary schools.

The choice of one of these three types of secondary education must not be irrevocable.

Let us assume that our ideal student chooses to enter a vocational high school (the situation will be much the same for commercial schools). He will spend the first two years of high school in a pre-vocational or pre-commercial liberal arts course.

In these two years he will receive an education in science, history, fine arts, comparative religion and perhaps a rudimentary philosophy course. Such a pre-vocational education will have two advantages:

(a) if the student remains in the vocational school it is likely he will not continue into university. The pre-vocational course will thus enable him to function as a fully-conscious member of society and a fully-developed individual.

(b) if the student finds that the vocational or commercial secondary school is not where he belongs and wishes to enter an academic school within the first two years of his secondary education, the pre-vocational education will allow him to do so without losing time.

If the student continues in the vocational or commercial school then, the secondary level will possibly be the last stage of his formal education, but he will emerge from it with more than just the knowledge of a trade.

Let us assume that our ideal student after two years in the vocational school has transferred to an academic school. He will find that he has five years of secondary education ahead of him lasting up to approximately the age of twenty.

During these five years he will receive a very broad liberal arts and sciences education. On the analogy of the first article in this series, he will receive a cursory knowledge of the entire list of contents of the hypothetical book comprising man's knowledge.

Only at this level can the danger that is to come later from extreme specialization be averted. The curriculum, consisting of eleven compulsory upper-school papers has already been outlined in another article in the series.

Those for whom the academic secondary school is the end of the educational road will thus be equipped to extract as much as possible from the life around them.

For those who are going on to University the responsibilities involved in the specialized training that they will sooner or later be getting means that more time yet must be spent in a general training in the humanities and sciences. For this reason it should be compulsory that all university students acquire a BA degree in a general arts course before being allowed to specialize in an honors or professional course.

(a) This will lay an even firmer foundation of liberal education under the specialists that our society must have.

(b) It will effect certain beneficial changes in the structure of our universities.

For one thing, the general course will become a much more important and respected one than at present. Secondly, more stu-

'Tis Folly To Be Fun

True to its form University College's annual stage production used, as its basic element, Folly, but folly, even when wittily done and hilariously played, can become tedious when overextended. In the opening act the UC Follies revealed the desperate thinness of its own plot, the only elements offering interest and substance being two rousing choruses, the JCR SONG and CHANSON DES CARABINS.

In writing this year's Follies the triumvirate of Michael Cowan, Sheldon Godfrey and Simon Zysman adhered brilliantly to the classic and proven format of campus satire, petty campus politics, Arts-Engineering rivalries, effeminate aberrations, husband-hunting co-eds and professors who though well-primed their prime remain well-primed. To a point the formula gave the UC FOLLIES a fine show but, by overloading the basically thin lamina of plot-structure and stretching the length beyond the logical point of ending, the production began to founder and to lose its audience almost half an hour before the final curtain.

The finale tried, without success, to draw in the threads of too many sub-plots, some all too superficial and without seeming connection to a main line. All of which elaboration served often to camouflage and partially to obscure the basic plot development, particularly in the third act, where digression beamed the standard and the theme an aside.

Despite the digressions and want of cohesiveness, the imaginative quality inherent in the script and the clever lines woven into it produced brilliant moments for the appreciative audience to take home for later chuckles. Lucy Shiffman taught little French as 'Mlle. Lafarge' but taught audience and cast alike a masterful lesson in the art of comedy. In her manner, in her laugh, a tickly sort of titter, and in her sympathetically devastating tekeoff, Miss Shiffman was superb as the fluttery French teacher.

There are others to whom much credit is due but due to the grossly inadequate program these cannot be identified other than by the names of the characters they portrayed. Numbered among these is Professor Grosbacher, the bombastic Teuton, Vergil, the travel-fatigued WUS representative, and others too many for individual mention.

Ruth Kellerman was outstanding among the leads. The sincerity and warmth of her performance won the audience to her from her first appearance. Slightly less effective but still worthy of merit, Susan Kastner and Mary Schiff served adequately in support of Miss Kellerman.

This edition of UC FOLLIES, though tending to lack polish, and continuity, is fortunate in having such enthusiasm, in its cast which offset technical failings. Coupling this asset with arresting use of colour and lighting the '58 Follies catches the eye and holds the interest.

"Rev, just a minute fellas. Can't we get together and talk this over after all?"

Monotony At The Museum

I wish I could say that the Toronto Shakespeare Society is to be commended for presenting the lesser-known works of our greatest playwright. But the truth is, I can't.

The Society's Rude Mechanicals, under the magnificently incompetent direction of Guy Purser, were supposedly presenting Shakespeare's King John in the Museum Theatre; what this reviewer was treated to was more in the manner of Much Ado About Nothing, or The Comedy Of Errors.

From the outset, the company seemed transfixed on the horns of a twentieth-century dilemma: whether to treat the play as serious drama, or as just a big joke. Neither treatment worked. The production was not without a certain amount of suspense, however; most of the audience were on the edge of their seats, wondering if the final curtain was ever going to fall.

The characterization rarely rose above the level of a "Rawhide" parody, without being half as enjoyable. Stage movement was conspicuous by its almost total absence.

I may be wrong, but I believe that some of the actors had actually read the play before going on stage. In any case, when the French citizen exclaimed: "If zealous love should go in search of virtue, where should he find it purer than in Blanch?", Blanch (mournfully played by Ann Henniker-Smith) bestowed a virtuous (i.e. vacant) smile upon the audience. It was an exciting moment.

Vain attempts to capitalise on the "willing suspension of disbelief" produced remarkable results. Not only was the iron that was to blind young Arthur to all appearances stone-cold even before the heart of Hubert (unintelligibly played by Lee Norgate) was softened, but it also fell to the floor with a most unmetallic clank. Austria's severed head emitted a distressingly rubbery sound as it hit the receiving earth. This was hardly to be wondered at, as Barrie Baldaro's portrayal of the ill-fated duke, was hardly more than a cardboard caricature.

Guy Purser played the title role as a merry monarch, a laugh-a-minute king. Even his death scene had the disturbing appearance of a sustained practical joke, the conclusion of which would involve hurling custard pies at the audience. Apparently the rest of the cast was not in on the joke, but played in a variety of roles which ranged from the merely pathetic to the positively ridiculous. And the "Dauphine" (Alan Routledge) just looked sick.

In a production "as tedious as a twice-told tale, vexing the dull ear of a drowsy man," Hubert's line: "Indeed, I have been merrier" was much appreciated by us on the other side of the footlights.

And even the cast party was a distinct failure.

Warren Pearce.

Childbirth "Au Naturel"

The Case Of Dr. Laurent (York), furnishes an excellent example of what publicity men can do to an otherwise fine film.

The publicity given this film is aimed at viewers who rate a film exclusively on its smut content. Justice triumphs, however, as those eluded souls who go solely for smut will be sadly disappointed. And since justice is always tempered with mercy, they will see a fine film.

The story line of the film is its weak-point—but since the film is intended as a platform for the doctrines of Grantly Dick Read's natural childbirth, this is of little import.

As the film opens, Dr. Laurent (capably played by veteran actor Jean Gabin) arrives at a tiny village high in the French Alps-Maritimes to take over the practice of the beloved and understanding but old-fashioned medicine man who has tended the village for the last fifty years. The eager doctor, fresh from the cosmopolitan atmosphere of Paris, immediately runs into a stone wall of local prejudice when he gives a lecture on natural childbirth to the prolific villagers, unmarried as well as married.

The lecture is but sparsely attended, but the "Beautiful French girl who wanted her baby born in public" attends, and this is where the rambling story begins to gather momentum and direction. This beautiful girl (Nicole Courcel) carries her problem with her, and all because the only son of the village doctor, didn't quite do the honorable thing. Anyway, it would appear that because this fine flower is an outcast and Dr. Laurent is being frowned on for his invasion of what had been up to that time an exclusively feminine field, she decides that she should, of all the mothers-to-be in the village will adopt his new-fangled theory.

From this moment on, the plot takes to a climax. The medical council, true conservatives that they are, decide to impeach Dr. Laurent for his medical practice in trying to publicize natural childbirth. A last minute concerted rush by all the village women—by now converted to the new theory—gets the young mother-to-be to the council meeting where nature follows its course and the good doctor is exonerated. Mark one up on the production.

The much-heralded birth scene is amazingly frank; nonetheless, it is extremely tasteful. Some wonderful shots of the French Alps and some scenes of the village life add to the atmosphere of typical villagers.

It is only to be regretted that director Jean Paul Le Chamois could not find some way to work himself into the picture based upon author Jean Paul Le Chamois' story (adapted by Jean Paul Le Chamois), but obviously, this was an impossibility.

Basketball Blues On Southern Tour League Prospects Not Promising

The arrival of colder weather will see the University of Toronto Blues basketball team migrating to the deep southern latitudes.

In December 11 they commence a 15-game jaunt through the southern, United States, stopping at places like Memphis, Jacksonville, Miami, and Tampa.

They return home on January 17 to host McGill in the first scheduled league game.

Drilling the team nightly, head coach John McManus wasn't too optimistic about the team's chances on the exhibition trip.

"We'll be lucky to score twenty points a game down there," commented John.

He did think however, that the experience picked up during the tour would prove beneficial in league play.

A stroke of bad luck has hampered the Blues' chances both on the trip and in the league. Guard Don Lipke, who was last year's top scorer with a 12.6 average, suffered a collapsed lung during the summer and was ordered not to play by his doctor.

Instead he will coach the Intermediate team.

Five lettermen are returning from last year's championship squad. They are: guard Ruby Richman, who was the top scorer for the Blues in 1956-57, 6'5" centre Rollit Goldring, forwards Dan Norman and Curt Russell, and Joe Stulac.

Other than Lipke, McManus is feeling the loss of centre Gary Vipond, forwards Hesh Rotman and Al Vaichulis, and guard George Stulac.

Most promising newcomers are: 6'4" centre Bob Ecclestone, forward Bill Patterson and forward Andy Nigrini, all up from the intermediates.

Other promising prospects, centre John Dacyshyn, and forward

Jim Maguire, will miss the trip because of Christmas exams.

The man with the plusher job in the University is footballer Bob Dann. He will act as team manager, handing out the sun-tan lotion whenever it is needed.

This year the Blues will be shooting to capture their second Intercollegiate title in a row. Their win last year was the first in 18 years by a Varsity team.

ROLLIT GOLDRING, a 6'5" centre will be one of the stalwarts as the Blues seek their second consecutive hoop title.

Football Playoffs Begin On Monday Victoria, Trinity Co-Favourites

Jr. Skule defeated Pharmacy 6-0 on the back campus yesterday in Group II football play, and thus ended the Druggists' chances of entering the post-season playoffs.

Intramural Indoor Track

Intramural indoor track started last night in Hart House, and will continue each Tuesday and Thursday throughout this term and into January.

The events are held in the Upper Gym at 5 p.m., with each competitor requested to register at the intramural office, before the event in which he plans to participate.

Pharmacy could have finished one point ahead of Dentistry by winning and thus cop the third and last playoff spot. Instead, Dents now enter the playoffs as they meet Senior Skule in the quarter-finals.

The other quarterfinal set sees Victoria and Jr. SPS clash for the right to play UC in the semi final.

The winner of the Dents Sr. SPS game will meet the undefeated winners of Group I, Trinity.

On Wednesday, the semi-finals will be played to determine who will play in the final match for the Mulock Cup in Varsity Stadium.

Vic and Trinity are favoured to be finalists for the third year in a row.

Other intramural sports activity saw Pre-Med "A" climax an unbeaten season in soccer by defeating Jr. SPS 1-0. Helmut Schmidt scored the only goal of the game.

In lacrosse action Trinity beat Pre-Med 6-1. Riesberry paced the Panthers with five goals. Griffith tallied the other.

SPS "A" defeated Pre-Med "A" 15-10, 16-14, in volleyball action.

Vic II trounced SPS VI by a 3-0 tune in interfaculty squash play.

Intramural hockey begins next week, with St. Mike's and Trinity expected to be the big contenders for this season's championship.

Girls Swimming Team Chosen Badminton Tournament Arranged

By SHARON MILGRAM

da Kriisa, and Elizabeth Bell. Divers: Jane Furness, and Margaret White.

The first practice for the team will be held on Nov. 19th at 8.30 p.m. at the Hart House pool. Preceding the practice will be a supper meeting at Falconer Hall at six o'clock.

The other swim meet was the one in which the UC girls gave their all in attempting to win the Taylor trophy, emblematic of swimming supremacy at UC.

This meet, which was considered successful, was highly competitive.

The final standings saw Ann McCullagh and Elenora Standish tied for first place. They were followed by Kit Magee and Marg Racine.

Because of the keen interest developed this year in swimming, plans are being made to form an Intermediate Intercollegiate team. More news of this will be reported in the near future.

Returning to terra firma, there appear various girls' sports. A round-robin badminton tournament will be held on Nov. 19th at the drill hall at 7 p.m. All equipment will be supplied. Anyone may enter this tournament.

The enthusiasm already built up for this competition indicates that it will be just as or even more successful than last year's fun-packed tourney.

Switching from outdoor to indoor shooting are the archers, who practice at 1 p.m. on either or all of Monday, Tuesday, and Friday at the drill hall.

A tournament for indoor archery will be held just before Christmas. Winners of this big shoot will be eligible to try out for the Intercollegiate Archery team.

The team will participate in the United States Intercollegiate tournament sometime after Christmas.

The only requirements for entering the U of T tournament is that you attend at least one of the three weekly practices each week from now until Christmas.

Third Year As All-Star Russell Takes Copp

By JOHN BROOKS
Varsity Sports Editor

Veteran centre and linebacker Curt Russell, co-captain of the Intercollegiate champion Varsity Blues, was yesterday named winner of the Johnny Copp Memorial Trophy, awarded annually to the player adjudged "most worthy" by his team-mates.

Russell, playing in his third year with Blues, rose from the ranks of intramural play in 1955, and developed into a versatile and conscientious performer.

Now 22, he was chosen to the Intercollegiate all-star team in his first two seasons, and a Canadian Press announcement last night confirmed Russell had been named to the CP team for the third consecutive year.

The Copp Trophy is awarded annually, on the vote of the team members, to the player they consider most worthy of the award. It commemorates the late Johnny Copp, a star of Varsity football in the early 30's, who was killed one night by a gunman trying to break into his parents' Wellesley Street home.

Oddly, Russell came to the University of Toronto in 1955 strictly as a student after graduating from Loyola High School in Baltimore, Maryland.

He played with St. Michael's in intramural competition during his first season, and was invited to Varsity's Lake Couchiching training camp in the fall of 1956.

He is the type of player every coach dreams of having on his team. A hard, fast tackler, Russell has the peculiar instinct of anticipating opposition plays and that sixth sense stood Blues in good stead this past season.

He worked mainly at linebacker this season, but handled the centre position on Varsity punts, due to his possession of an accurate, speedy snap.

Ironically, Russell was one of the best punters on the team, but the difficulties in punting one's own snap are self-explanatory.

The Copp Trophy was won last season by tackle John Casey.

who graduated from Intercollegiate ranks to the Toronto Argonauts. The Scullers regarded him as the prize pick from college ranks in the annual Canadian Rugby Union draft last year.

Two years ago, it was won by fine defensive end Gene Chorostecki, who missed last season with a serious back injury, but returned to haunt opposing quarterbacks in 1958.

Russell, who is completing his Master of Arts degree in philosophy, may be back for another crack at Varsity football. It is possible the six-foot, 200-pound ace may take his Ph.D. degree.

CURT RUSSELL

co-captain of this year's champion football Blues who was yesterday named winner of the Johnny Copp Trophy.

Staff Appointments

Sports Editor John Brooks last night announced several appointments in The Varsity sports department staff. Each of the changes is effective immediately.

Football writer Dave Griner and hockey reporter Gene Glesky have been promoted to positions of Associate Sports Editor.

Mr. Griner will be in complete charge of all intramural sports, while Mr. Glesky will handle minor Intercollegiate sports as well as continuing on his senior hockey beat.

Mike Chykaliuk, Varsity football Blues' outstanding tackle, has joined the staff to handle Intercollegiate senior basketball, along with wrestling and boxing activities. Miss Sharon Milgram and Miss Pam Hill will continue to cover women's sports, while Mike Laurel Ball has been added to the staff as an exclusive sports reporter-photographer. Mr. Brooks will continue as Sports Editor, writing his column, by John Brooks, and covering Intercollegiate senior and intermediate swimming during the winter season.

Should Students Wed? Nurses Win With A No

Undergraduate celibacy, male gallantry, and two pretty representatives of the School of Nursing defeated the Engineers yesterday.

In a debate, "Resolved that students should wait for marriage until after graduation from university," the nurses successfully defended the resolution, and their opponents conceded the battle until next year.

Fran Runnings (III Nursing), first speaker for the nurses, emphasized the financial difficulties of undergraduate marriage, and suggested students are often not mature enough to meet the problems of marriage. "Mistakes often happen, because nature is bigger than any of us. Nurses could meet this problem, because they know how to handle a baby. An Engineer would probably measure it in centimetres," she said.

"There are no insurmountable financial problems in marriage," said Murray Woodside (III SPS). "The parents can continue to pay the bills, and we can get down to business."

"Our condition is not natural, as any Engineer will admit. Marriage is the best way to get together," he said. "A girl should forget her career, and settle down to her natural destiny of supporting Joe Skule."

Joanne Jermyn (III Nursing) said Engineers seem to think the only reason for marriage is to legalize sex. "I'm not advocating repression, I'm advocating conscious suppression," she said.

A married Engineer, Huntly Christie (IV SPS) said travel for a married undergraduate would be less expensive. "After all, a double bed is cheaper than two rooms," he said.

"I can only recommend student marriage when the wife is working," he said. "If the husband is an Artsman, it doesn't matter how good a job the wife has, he's not going to get through."

After a conference with the Nurses, the Engineers gallantly asked if the debate had been a tie, or if the Nurses had won.

The Nurses had won.

Trinity Mission Ends:

Speakers Discuss Life And Sex

This year's Trinity Mission concluded its work on the U of T campus yesterday with two discussions on Christian spiritual responsibility and Christian marriage.

"We must beware of becoming spiritual isolationists," said Father Kenneth Terry, O.H.C., Chief Missioner speaking in Trinity Convocation Hall yesterday afternoon on "This Is Your Life."

To receive the power of God, a Christian must undergo the process of withdrawal and return. "But this transfiguration can have no purposes or meaning unless the person returns to his original social environment," he said.

Only with divine strength can we become God's instrument in passing on the vision of Christ to the "moral and material slums" of society, Father Terry continued.

"University students should realize that unless God is at the centre of their lives, emptiness and frustration will result."

"God Made Sex" was the title of the second discussion, which was held in the Trinity College Junior Common Room last night.

"Sex in its proper context is good," said Rev. Borden Purcell, leader of the discussion.

"The Church considers marriage a creative and wonderful thing," he said. "Adultery is not the unforgivable sin, but beware the thrill-making machine, for it will bring diminishing returns."

"A person entering marriage must have his eyes wide open. Each partner needs a mature outlook on life."

Marriage is not simply a contract that can be broken at will, he continued. "No earthly power can declare a marriage null and void."

"Without God's help, the responsibilities of marriage are overwhelming. When two people enter Holy Matrimony they do so in the sight and knowledge of God."

Dead Student Spirit May Kill AVR's "Have Toga"

U of T's long-sought, much-discussed original bookshow shows sure signs of going down in defeat before it even gets started.

With auditions half-over for the All-Varsity Revue's "Have Toga, Will Travel", a grand total of 10 students have tried out for the show's 50 parts.

AVR producer Bill Lord called the lack of interest "pretty depressing" last night. Some of those who tried out were "quite good", he said, but "if we do not get the co-operation of the students on campus then we cannot produce a show that the campus deserves."

When auditions opened Thursday night, seven people appeared in the Howard Ferguson Hall basement. Friday three more hopefuls turned up.

"Maybe it's true that campus spirit is non-existent after all, but we hope it isn't," he said. There will be "no casting until after we see what turns up in the next two nights," he said.

Auditions will continue tonight and tomorrow at 7.30 p.m. in the Howard Ferguson Hall basement.

The show has 15 speaking roles and a large chorus. Victoria College students Dick Dean and Stan Farrow collaborated on book and music for the show.

Main positions on the production staff have been filled, but there are still openings for interested students, Lord said.

U of M Students Welcome Breakthrough To Duplessis

Montreal—CUP—Premier Maurice Duplessis' letter to McGill students announcing that he would grant an interview in the near future received a "warm welcome" from students at the University of Montreal Saturday.

The President of the U of M's students' society, Jean Cournoyer, said last night he was "very happy the Premier had agreed to an interview with the student presidents."

"The Premier's gesture Thursday night constitutes official recognition of the student movement", Cournoyer stated, "and I am very happy to emphasize the point."

In his letter, Duplessis said the main topic to be discussed at the interview would be financial aid to higher education in Quebec.

This includes both statutory provincial grants to the universities and direct student aid in the form of scholarships and bursaries. A brief on higher education in Quebec submitted to the Premier last year will form the basis for the discussion.

Cournoyer continued; "Although the system of loans referred to in Mr. Duplessis' promises to create a student loan fund during the next session of the Quebec legislature does not fit our ideas, we will not refuse to discuss the plan with the Premier."

"His plan, if well administered by an independent governmental organization in which the students are represented, will certainly be an improvement over the present situation."

Cournoyer concluded his remarks by saying "we only hope these measures will be but the first step towards the goal of free education."

The President of the McGill Students' Council, Roy Heenan, expressed the hope that "this interview is an indication of a new attitude on the part of the provincial government towards the issue."

In a statement released to the press Saturday, Heenan pointed out that Duplessis' action in granting the interview gains significance in the light of last year's refusal to agree to any sort of meeting at all.

The students' society president said he feels that student interest, which "first expressed itself in the boycott of lectures last year and has continued ever since," was a major factor in the Premier's change of attitude.

Heenan said it is probable a meeting of the Quebec Association of Universities, a student organization, will take place within the next few weeks to discuss the issues to be presented at the interview, scheduled for Dec. 2.

The presidents of the six students' councils will also meet in Quebec City several days before the actual meeting to prepare their case and discuss in detail their approach to the problems.

Athletic Fee Increase? Argo's Gain Our Loss

Lew Hayman, general manager of the Toronto Argonauts pro football team last night said the upcoming move by the team from Varsity Stadium to the Canadian National Exhibition grandstand is a simple matter of doing "more business for less money."

But J. P. Loosemore, U of T athletic association financial secretary, last night said the university will have to give help "in one way or another" to pull the association out of the $230,000 hole created by the move.

Argo revenues, he said, are at least partially irreplaceable.

Suggested partial remedies have been a $5 increase in U of T men's athletic fees, cutbacks in Varsity Blues expenditures and direct aid from the U of T Board of Governors. Such aid would mark the first university subsidy of the association since the latter was founded in 1893.

Pressing problem of the association is the $230,000 balance of borrowings by it from the Board of Governors. The loans originally totalled $842,820.

The loans were obtained to finance seating expansion in 1950 and the installation of floodlights in 1955.

Mr. Loosemore said the obligations from the floodlights are now almost all paid.

Mr. Hayman said a $70,000 floodlight commitment of the Argos would be paid off. The commitment is in lieu of further payments on an undertaking by the Argos two years ago to pay a percentage of night-game gate receipts.

This was at the time when the CNE grandstand expansion program was being approved by the Toronto city council, he said. The affair "became a bit political."

The association got about $90,000 from the Argos this year, Mr. Hayman said.

The move is a simple matter of business, he said. He cited somewhat cheaper rent, greater seating capacity, greater between-the-goal-lines capacity, parking space and public transportation facilities.

UTDU eighth—

Yanks Love Parliamentary Style

The U of T Debating Union Saturday talked its way into eighth place in a 23-university debating tournament in Rochester.

The four-man UTDU team won six of its ten engagements on the topic "Resolved that further development of nuclear weapons should be prohibited by international agreement" to top the high standing in the University of Rochester's debating tournament.

First place was taken by the team representing St. John's University, of New York City. Toronto was the only Canadian university to send a team to the tournament, an annual event.

Members of the Toronto affirmative team, which won four of its five encounters, were Peter Dembski (Hf SMC) and Malcolm Wallace, (IUC).

Pat Wooten (I Trin.) and Richard Tan (I SMC) upheld the negative of the resolution, and were successful in two of their five debates.

The Toronto team received high praise from the American universities for its use of the parliamentary style of debating.

Lib Says CCF "Farm Group"

A former Liberal member of parliament for York-Scarborough, addressing the campus Liberal club Friday, attracted about as many CCF'ers as Liberals.

Speaking on the proposed CCF-Canadian Labor Congress merger Frank Enfield said, "The trade unions would be making a big mistake by forming such a party."

These were his "personal views," he said, not those of the "great Liberal party."

The CCF and CLC have not merged yet, he said, but the CLC will be investigating the possibility in the next two years.

"A successful Canadian political party must have national appeal. Such a party must legislate not only for labor but for the country's interests."

"In national politics, there must be a compromise to satisfy all the country's interests."

Mr. Enfield, a Victoria College graduate, said we must recognize the former CCF parliamentary majority came from Saskatchewan and was actually a "farm pressure group."

"CCF party leaders," he said, "opposed the parliamentary pro-farmer policy."

"Let us not ignore that labor has its problems," the economist said. "We must try to keep wages in line with prices."

"If the government wants to support a policy to avoid runaway inflation, more and more attention must be paid to price and productivity," he said. "You can't have it two ways. An effort must be made to match the returns."

INCO METALS AT WORK IN CANADA

For bright lasting beauty choose appliances
plated with Inco Nickel

Electrical appliances with a gleaming plated finish add bright beauty to your kitchen. And how much easier and more efficient they make your household tasks. Food stains, grease, dirt and grime wipe off so easily. Properly plated appliances won't chip, crack or deteriorate in appearance. How nice to know that the appliances you buy today will stay bright and new looking for years to come.

We ordinarily speak of these appliances as being "chrome-plated". Actually, they're plated with both nickel and chromium. On the surface, a thin film of chromium helps give appliances their bright, shiny appearance... but underneath, a heavy coating of nickel provides the real protection against rust, corrosion and wear.

Nickel plating has become a major industry in Canada. Electrical appliances, hardware, automobile parts and many other articles used in industry and the home are plated with Inco Nickel. Another way that Inco Nickel serves the Canadian industries that serve you.

Inco has recently published a colourfully illustrated 32-page booklet about Canada's nickel industry, entitled "The Exciting Story of Nickel". It is written primarily for Canadian youth by Alan King, but adults will also find it full of interesting information. Just write to Inco for a free copy of this booklet.

Enlarged cross section shows nickel plating... under chromium... over base metal; that's how a quality finish is built on appliances. Chromium adds gleaming beauty. Nickel makes that beauty last.

MCWA Closes On Global Note

MONTREAL — CUP — Delegates from 35 Canadian and American universities were told Friday problems of Canadian-United States relations must be considered in an international frame of reference as the second McGill Conference on World Affairs drew to an end here.

Presenting the closing address to conference delegates Friday night, US Representative Frank M. Coffin (Dem.-Maine) said "it would be quite easy for the US and Canada to sit down and work out bilateral stockpiling, marketing and surplus disposal . . . and yet, what would happen to Peru, Bolivia, Argentina and Australia?"

Recent national election results, he said, are an indication of a resentment of the U.S. on the part of Canadians. But Canadians should realize that "a greater awareness of USA-Canadian problems has developed during the past year or more."

The time has come for both nations to forget grievances and emphasize examples of improving relations, he said.

Mr. Coffin collaborated with Representative Brooks Hays in a preliminary report on U.S.-Canadian relations in 1957. Since the a similar study has been undertaken by the U.S. Senate, and a closer contact has been established between many governmental levels of the two countries.

Friday afternoon saw disagreement between members of a panel on French Canada's role in North America.

Pierre Tisseyre, president of the French Publishers Association of Canada, felt there is a possibility that Canada may become bilingual in the next 15 years.

But novelist Hugh MacLennan said realization of this prediction would necessitate improved French instruction in schools outside the province of Quebec.

American delegates at the conference confessed they had expected some hostility from Canadians. They were surprised at the warmth and sympathy with which Canadians greeted them, they said.

The conference ended Saturday morning with reports on round table discussions. General feeling among delegates was that none of the problems facing good relations between the U.S. and Canada were insoluble.

Have Girls Need Beds

The Hart House glee club is looking for beds—80 of them in fact.

The glee club has promised to find one-night accommodations for 85 members of the University of Rochester Women's Glee Club. So far they have received pledges for five beds, glee club member Terry Jabour said last night.

The girls will participate in a Tri-university concert Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in the Hart House Great Hall.

Anyone willing or able to offer bed-space for Saturday night is asked to give details to the Hart House hall porter, Jabour said.

Tickets for the Saturday night concert will be on sale all this week in Hart House, he said.

Drop Limit On Telecast —take all ages

U of T students of any age who possess the ability to express themselves in French may now apply for a special half-hour panel telecast next month.

The age limits governing applicants for the program, "Opinion", to be produced by Radio-Canada, the French-language division of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, have been extended to include students of any age.

The original age limits when the special program was announced last week were from 18 to 19.

President Jocelyn Leduc of the St. Mike's French Club last night said the program's co-ordinator, Miss Jeanne Sauve, had agreed to the upward revision because of the small number of students who have applied so far.

Only nine applications have been received as yet.

"Miss Sauve realized that these age limits eliminated many students in second, third and fourth years, and so she agreed to the change," Miss Leduc said.

Applicants for the show will be interviewed by Miss Sauve in Toronto on Nov. 24.

The show, to be telecast live from the CBC's Toronto studios, will be broadcast to a Montreal audience on the night of Dec. 7.

Applications for one of the four spots on the panel should be filed with the presidents of the campus French clubs as soon as possible.

Students enrolled in professional faculties are also eligible for the show.

jests at scars

It was ash-grey and overcast on Remembrance Sunday afternoon. A slight drizzle of rain leaked down, from the empty branches of the Queens Park trees and padded softly into the still green earth.

In Britain they would have ignored it. They would have called it a Scotch mist and gone on playing cricket having their picnic.

But here they call it rain, and since rain is notoriously wet and uncomfortable, they stayed indoors.

Thus as the parade swirled north to the tune of "Road to the Isles" with kilts swinging and bagpipe stems wet and gleaming and crisp, polished leather dancing with shining brass, only a very few people stood on the dripping sidewalks to watch it go by:

It wasn't much of a parade.

There was just the pipe band of the 48th Highlanders and behind them various assorted dignitaries and behind them—the veterans.

The veterans were not the most respectable contingent that ever marched in a parade. Nor were they particularly pitiful, as one sometimes imagines. In point of fact, many of them were more or less tipsy, and several berets were askew as the murmuring band trotted sternly towards the Cenotaph and duty.

Everybody saw the flag.

The young, newly-enlisted bandmen saw it and not a few of them grinned behind their sternly disciplined faces. Most of the dignitaries saw it too. And they laughed out loud. What the hell? Its just another harmless student prank, they told themselves bracing their countenances for more sober tasks.

What, after all, is a Swastika to successful men of the world?

Let auld acquaintance be forgot and never brought to mind.

Then, unfortunately, the veterans saw the Swastika. They, intent on remembering things the dignitaries could forget and the recruits could never know, they saw it—and remembered the many times they had been it before.

This one was dangling from a second floor window of a student residence, and three young, laughing, stupid faces flanked the remains of one bloody war and twenty years ago.

The veterans were furious, almost blindly furious. Two of them broke rank and headed for the residence courtyard. The laughing faces of the students wilted beneath an avalanche of obscenity. The flag was withdrawn and apologies rendered. The two veterans, still cursing, went off to join their comrades and later to discuss—over infinite pints of beer—the sad and damning ignorance of the generation others had died to save.

Everybody feels very penitent about the whole thing, especially the students who did it. It was, they say, a stupid, boorish mistake. Their Dean has apologized to everybody and refuses to discuss the matter further. Their college president calls it a "prank" and passes it off lightly to the rest of the world. Let's, they all insist, forget it.

And forget it we will. So—in time—will the three students who acted before they thought forget it, bitter though their pangs of regret must be now.

The Dean will forget it and the President will forget it—if he has not done so already. The Highlanders will forget it and the dignitaries will forget it. The few people that watched the incident in the drizzling rain will forget it and you will forget it.

If everybody could forget it, there would be no harm done that day in the rain and the things people stand for and die for would still be sacred and unviolated.

But, unfortunately, the veterans will not forget it, much as they would like to.

And in this matter, they are the ones that count.

To be quite frank about it, we find ourselves trapped between the analyst and the deep red terror.

On either side of the world lie two of the most efficient and prolific propaganda machines man has ever devised—and both sides remain heroically modest about their achievements.

The word "propaganda" itself deserves a certain amount of qualification. It has been the victim, far from the only victim, of colloquial abuse which dates roughly from the rise in power in Germany of Dr. Paul Joseph Goebbels. It is somewhat of a tribute to Dr. Goebbels' energy that the word has seldom been used without evil implications since.

In fact the word is not at all evil. It is used with ecclesiastical dignity by the Church of Rome to describe a committee of cardinals in charge of foreign missions. More basically it means to "propagate or disseminate one's beliefs, faith, doctrines, principles or practices."

The inherent dangers of propaganda of any sort are demonstrated by Hitler's "Mein Kampf". Hitler, struggling perhaps against his own conscience, found reason to state clearly the principle underlying the book.

"All propaganda has to be popular and has to adapt its spiritual level to the perception of the least intelligent of those towards who it intends to direct itself."

In these terms propaganda must reduce itself to the lowest and most base of its denominators: There can, presumably, be no such thing as intellectual propaganda.

Beyond this weakness, the intelligent student will be quick to grasp a more subtle weakness. There is considerable distinction between merely propagating one's own doctrines and destroying the other fellow's.

The two great ideologies behind the propaganda machines have been guilty of this weakness for years. In fact they have been doing it so long that the average person equates the simple term "propaganda" with "corrupt propaganda" without realizing the difference.

And of the two machines, yelling, insinuating, cat-calling and whining on either side of us, the West's machine is by far the most dishonest and corrupt.

The doctrines of Communism as fairly easily defined, Marx is the prophet and Lenin is the prophet's son. In the writings of these two men are found all that one knows or need know about the foundation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republic.

The fact that the USSR is neither a union, nor socialist nor a republic doesn't enter into the matter. The doctrines of what it wishes itself to be are quite clear and this, in the main, is the backbone and substance of Russian propaganda.

The West is in a much less enviable position. Its ideology cannot possibly be summed up in one word and the prophets and prophet's sons have been so innumerable and inconsistent to make it very worthwhile.

But to fight the enemy on his own ground, the United States has decided to ignore this and summarize western philosophy in the one word, "democracy". Having done this, it can go no farther. "Democracy" must be the most intangible term that exists. Its connotations are so numerous and so involved that no man, or even committee of men, has yet succeeded in defining it in all its senses and implications.

Yet we are subjected, day after day, to a hurricane of propaganda on the subject of democracy and its assets. Western history is slowly being rewritten to tone down tyranny in our development and accentuate the democratic urge. Our contact and knowledge of current events is democratically oriented on our behalf. The concept of all our traditions and developments have been simplified beyond hope of clarity to appeal to the least intelligent of our citizens and confirm irrevocably in their minds the necessity of being free.

But this is not the worst. It is, base, it is dishonest, and it contradicts the very essence of that which it is intending to propagate, but it is not the worst.

The worst is that the American propaganda machine, frequently finding "democracy" becomes embarrassing when it becomes over-simplified, spends by far the largest proportion of its time twisting the doctrines of Communism into hideous shapes and weird, wicked proportions.

The nation as a whole has responded well to this "conditioning". Like a bull, when it sees red it seems to lose control. And the net, destructive result of this propaganda is the virtual abolition of communication.

The average second and third class Americans know less about true democracy than did their great, great grandfathers. Confused, indoctrinated and brainwashed, they absorb the mass advertising of their creeds and recite by rote the various doctrines of justice. They seldom know why.

Their propaganda machine, which unfortunately speaks for all of us, is the most complex ever created.

Hitler would have been jealous.

What Campus Editors Say

From Friday's Late Editions

We in Toronto have become quite self-conscious as our fellow-Canadians over the years have pelted us with all manner of verbal refuse about "Hogtown" and with a slightly different tone of voice "Toronto the Good."

Last week The McGill Daily hopped on the bandwagon and started to yelp, objecting to The Varsity and its views of Quebec:

"Although this may shock many of our Ontario friends, we in Quebec are not as simple as we would appear on the surface. We are not all slaves to a 'Great White Father' or the suppressed subjects of a totalitarian regime."

Without really explaining the foregoing at any place, the Daily adds a little self-consciously: "In fact, we enjoy many of the freedoms and advantages inherent in the Western way of life."

There is no indication of just how many of these freedoms are enjoyed, nor to what degree.

Conforming to the general line of topics chosen by other editors, but with a non-conformist twist, the Queen's Journal supports the average Joes on campus who want to do what everyone else does.

Non-conformity isn't of itself a classical virtue, says the Journal—"only when it leads to a useful result."

"The vast majority of human beings are incapable of thinking beyond the normal run of events; for them to be non-conformists would be as sensible as for an elephant to masquerade as a mouse."

With a happy final thrust for those who want to be enthralled by the happy togetherness of an ivy-league existence in the coffee shop: "Non-conformity should be reserved for the few who are capable of thinking beyond the daily run of existence."

However, The Xaverian Weekly, from St. Francis Xavier University down in Antigonish, N.S., thinks a little differently.

The Xaverian last week hopped on the Bissell bandwagon with a cheer for angularity, complimenting the new U of T President for varying from the usual line:

"Often the pronouncements of presidents of anything from banks to bakeries with regard to college life and college students are strictly from Bartlett's Familiar Quotations."

Regarding angularity as "a mode of behavior somewhere between eccentricity and absolute, mediocre conformity," The Xaverian cheers. Reading matter, clothes, and general surface appearance when they conform to the norm, "are indications indeed, we are afraid to think for ourselves."

Angularity doesn't mean appearing outwardly odd, say the editors from St. F.X., it means developing our own ideas and learning those of preceding great teachers.

"Perservere, Dr. Bissell; may the cause of angularity which you espouse never become so extreme as to be square."

With a reaction that is partly the result of being politically astute, and partly the result of being born in Canada, student editors across the nation cheered at the outcome of the recent American election.

Like dogs at the master's table, they snapped at the crumbs of the crumbling Eisenhower administration. The Manitoban led the attack:

"The conquering hero was vanquished in the United States Tuesday . . . he was slapped in the face."

Describing Ike as "a hollow man, a stuffed man, filled with the pety of public adulation," The Manitoban said "the president cannot but realize that the failure at the polls was not entirely that of the Republican party."

"Mr. Eisenhower has been knocked from his perch. Thank God."

one night to remember at a dying theatre

Marguerite Jamois, leading tragedienne of the Theatre du Vieux-Colombier, appeared as Agrippine in "Britannicus"

As we staggered out of The Playhouse on Thursday night, we were living in another world—a Racine's world—and the sight of Loblaws in the drizzling rain dragged us back to stark reality. Yes, it was hard to believe that we were in Toronto, and yet had just undergone such an unparalleled experience as Le Theatre du Vieux-Colombier's brilliant production of BRITANNICUS. This was 'theatre' in the truest sense.

Racine's tragedy could seem stiff and rather stylized, as all the action is interior, and takes place in the hearts of the characters; however we were totally unaware of the rigidities of the classical form, so vigorous and so forceful was the production. Instead we found ourselves swept up in the swirl of their cloaks by the thundering lines of the dialogue. We were buffeted to and fro by the violent conflict of emotions, until we emerged finally feeling exhausted and limp. Racine had succeeded in purging all our emotions, and we could not help feeling that the company of the Vieux-Colombier had done full justice to this tragedy which he described as 'celle de mes tragedies que j'ai plus travaillée'.

From the rise of the curtain the atmosphere of the Roman scene was quickly established. (Racine had taken the subject of Britannicus from Tacitus' Roman history) and the simple set consisting of red curtains, a flight of steps and suggestions of columns in the background was extremely effective.

The actors made full use of this space, and their large gestures and impressive movements added vigour to their words. Neron (Jacques Francois) pounded to and fro with fire in his heart and words. We were able to watch with awful fascination the growth of this monster naissant, who is unable to wrench himself free of his 'fatal amour', and a weakling in the hand of fate, he finally succumbs to the evil machinations of Narcisse. Raymond Gerome, who had so ably directed this production, gave us one of the most superb performances of the whole evening with his subtle portrayal of this villain. We could have no eyes for any other character when he was on stage; each attitude, each flicker of the eyes, each glance and each visual expression was a masterpiece of studied villainy.

Marguerite Jamois fulfilled our expectations, and the great actress portrayed an imperious yet touching Agrippine with imposing grandeur. It was a delight to listen to her deep contralto voice with its flexibility rendering the full effect and beauty of Racine's poetry. Her lengthy harangue to Neron (Act IV, scene 2) was a masterpiece of declamation.

Both Junie and Britannicus were very fittingly cast, and besides looking their parts (which is a necessity), they added a significance to their roles, which could otherwise tend to be rather insipid, being Racine's weakest characterizations.

The lavish costumes were extraordinarily colourful, and played no small part in heightening the atmosphere of the tragedy.

At long last Toronto realised just what was here, and there was not a vacant seat to be found in The Playhouse (the neglected theatre). This magnificent French company was given the enthusiastic ovation that it so richly deserved. We had there shall never forget those three hours, and even those who didn't understand French, understood the perfection of the Vieux-Colombier's production.

Jazz at the Castle, and a sugar coating

In Toronto, Canada's best-known compositional jazz quintet, headed by Ron Collier, appeared in a concert at Casa Loma last Thursday night. On the same program Miss Portia White sang a selection of spirituals. Both parts of the concert were received with enthusiasm by the majority of the audience.

The compositional jazz honors were shared by Norm Symonds and Ron Collier. All musicians (Ed Bickert, guitar, Bernie Pilch, clarinet, alto, flute, Carle Bray, bass, and Ron Rully, drums) are highly capable professionals and presented the often difficult and sometimes awkward scores admirably.

Two selections, "She Gently Moves" (Symonds) and "Four Moods" (Collier) particularly appealed to this reviewer. The former consisted of three delicate movements extracted from a jazz dance suite, rich in texture, and opening with an extremely beautiful introduction. The latter was frantic showcase for far-out orchestration, sudden swinging parts superimposed on a generally pulsating theme, all wonderfully projected by the group.

Miss Portia White is an academic singer, similar in delivery to Marian Anderson. Her "Go Way From My Window" was a thrilling song, fully controlled by the range, timbre and vibrato of her voice. But spirituals may be better delivered by a less-trained and inferior vocalist with more feeling(?)

In contrast to Thursday's stiff, formal jazz, Friday's visit to Massey Hall by famous pianist Erroll Garner became a free-swinging affair.

The concert was dealt from many standpoints. It allowed a great musician sufficient time to give a fair account of his powers, it included a crammed bill of headline attractions cluttering up the stage in rapid variety show style, and mainly it brought together a public genuinely interested in the music and attentive to the business of listening.

Garner performed extraordinarily well, the intuitive interplay between him and the other two members, bass and drums was a delight to watch and pure joy to hear. Inventiveness and a charming musical tease characterized his playing. Deftly romping through "Dancing In The Dark", he opened the concert, then extracted hidden lyricism from "My Funny Valentine" after which a complex introduction opened into "I Get A Kick Out Of You".

Here, the drummer with light brushes and rapid wrists spelled out a sophisticated humorous. Sweet ballads, misty tunes, sugar-coated standards, all received the unique Garner treatment: frills with beat, classic scales, compelling rhythmic devices.

Garner is a heavy-handed happy genius with a gift for pleasing his listeners. Even a two-hour concert failed to exhaust his appealing repertoire.

We cannot even complain of monotony or repetition in his renditions. May he long continue to be as musical as he is now, it's a good way to sell jazz—sugarcoat it with Garner.

MIKE ELIK, rugged centre star with the Varsity Hockey Blues, and twice winner of the Dafoe Trophy as the most valuable Blues player, was appointed captain of this year's team.

Elik To Captain '58 Hockey Blues

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

Mike Elik, as fierce a competitor as ever donned skates in the Varsity cause, has been unanimously appointed captain of the 1958-59 Varsity Blues.

Playing his last season with the Blues, Elik will graduate this spring with a degree in Mechanical Engineering.

Mike Elik has been a stand-out performer since joining the Blues' roster in 1956-57. Twice winner of the Dafoe Trophy, symbolizing Blues most valuable player, Mike has led the team in scoring in both his seasons of play.

Elik has been described by coach Jack Kennedy as the finest hockey player Jack has had the pleasure to coach. Mike's drive, ability, and attitude to the game, have been a constant source of inspiration to the team.

Born in Western Canada, Mike had lived some time in Geraldton, of Northern Ontario fame, but began his hockey career in Toronto. Graduating from Humber College, Elik joined the Toronto Marlboros for the 53-54 campaign, and St. Michael's majors for 54-55. He saw action with the Intermediate Blues for one season before moving up to the big team.

During the football season Mike also acts as the assistant trainer to the Senior football squad.

fall training camp sessions with the Cleveland Barons.

Upon graduation Mike does not intend to forsake hockey. He would like to join some senior club as well as pursue his engineering career.

Acting as assistant captains this season will be Lorry Stacey and John Macdonald. Both are seasoned stars with the Varsity Blues, and both were members of Hap Emms' Barrie Flyers.

Mulock Cup Playoffs

The Mulock Cup playoffs begin today with Victoria and Trinity top-heavy favorites to meet in the finals.

Trinity romped through the season unbeaten in Group I, and therefore get a bye into the semi-final round.

Victoria, on the other hand, must knock off two teams before reaching the final game.

Sr. Skule meet Dentistry at 12 o'clock in Varsity Stadium today in the first game of the quarterfinals. The Engineers are not expected to have any trouble getting by the Dentists.

Both teams finished third in their respective leagues, but the Skulemen have more depth of players to draw upon and a better diversification of attack.

The other game at 2 o'clock sees Victoria meeting Jr. Skule. Here again the first division team is an overwhelming favorite to advance into the second round against UC-PHE.

Victoria had trouble with their offence all year, but in the final game with Sr. SPS they suddenly came to life and ran up a 30-0 score.

Don Seebach and Paul Sapuntzis with their running and passing respectively are the chief threats offensively for Vic, while Bill Bell and playing coach Steve Moriarty are the key figures on defence.

Triple threat man Derek Lunn, the SPS quarterback, is the top performer for the Engineers.

No less than fourteen University of Toronto Blues won places on the 1958 senior Intercollegiate offensive and defensive all-star teams, it was announced last night.

In a poll taken amongst the football writers on the four Intercollegiate newspapers, the Blues placed seven men on each squad.

Western followed Blues with five choices, and then came McGill and Queen's with three apiece. Joe Poirier, McGill's superb end was the only choice on both teams.

Varsity players to make the dream team were: Brian Aston, Tim Reid, Peter Joyce, Dick Risk, Weldon Thoburn, Don Johnston, Trevor Eyton, Gene Chorostecki, Doug Baird, Mike Chykaliuk, Curt Russell, Paul Burroughs, Bob Dann, and Larry Joynt.

Seven of the choices were unanimous. Reid, Risk, and Johnston of Toronto got all of the possible eight points in the balloting for the offensive team, while Paul Harasimowicz garnered all the points in the voting for tackle.

The defensive team saw two Toronto players, Bob Dann and Curt Russell, get eight points while Bill Mitchell of Western got the same number.

There were two ties in the voting. Terry Porter of Queen's and Wally Bulchak of McGill tied for the fourth spot in the backfield behind Joyce, Reid, and Lionel Conacher. Doug Baird and Don Robb of Queen's tied for the second defensive end position behind Gene Chorostecki.

Most of the voting at the other positions was very close. The defensive linebackers saw seven players only one vote behind the selected four.

Toronto, winner of the Yates Cup as Intercollegiate football champions, nearly had eighteen players on the team. Four more, other than the selected fourteen, were right behind players from other teams that were chosen.

Ed Meads and Ted Roman of Western were the only Mustang players to repeat their all-star selection of last year.

In gaining all-star recognition at quarterback, Brian Aston outpointed Frank Cosentino of Western five to three. This is Brian's first year as an all-star.

Larry Joynt, probably the best second-string quarterback in the league, repeated as a defensive backfielder on the team as did Russell at linebacker.

Three rookies, all from Toronto, made the team. Mike Chykaliuk was voted in at defensive tackle. Weldon Thoburn was on the offensive team in the same spot, while Doug Baird got a tie for the end spot.

INJURED ALLSTAR

Dick Risk, unanimous allstar choice at offensive end, was seriously injured in the final game of the season against McGill.

Throwing one of his bone-crushing blocks, Risk suffered a shoulder separation. He entered Toronto General Hospital that same night, and the shoulder was operated on and wired together.

In a telephone conversation last night, Dick informed a Varsity reporter that the shoulder was healing very well and should be out of splints well before the expected four weeks.

The allstar end has played his final season of football for the Blues, graduating in Law this spring.

Debate Economy, "Now"

Hart House will be the center of debating activity this week as two campus organizations sponsor debates Tuesday and Wednesday evenings.

Tomorrow night the U. of T. Commerce Club will present a panel of experts from labor and management discussing "The Role of Organized Labor in the Canadian Economy".

The panel is part of an exchange weekend between the Commerce Club and the Ontario Agricultural College's Economics Club.

Representing labor in the panel will be William Dodge, Executive vice-president of the Canadian Labor Congress, and Murray Cotterill, publicity director for the United Steelworkers of America.

On the side of management will be management consultant Norman Matthews, Q.C., and Alan Page, personnel director for the Goodyear Corporation.

Philosophy Professor Marcus Long will act as moderator for the panel.

Members of the panel are "not only experts in their field, but they are dynamic personalities, and we can expect an evening of fireworks," club secretary Don Wilson said last night.

The panel will begin at 8 p.m. Tuesday in the Hart House Debates Room.

Wednesday, University of Toronto Debating Union and McMaster University debaters will battle over the topic "Now is the Time" at 8:30 p.m. in the Hart House Debates Room.

Mac Wallace (III Vic) and Pat Wooten (II Trin.) will defend the motion for Toronto, McMaster students Tom Elliot and George Wright will make up the opposition team.

The debate is the last in a crowded schedule Wednesday for debaters from both universities. Wednesday morning members of both teams will argue the question "Resolved," that secondary school is an adequate preparation for university" at a Harbord Collegiate senior assembly.

In the afternoon, debaters will display their talents at a meeting of the St. Michael's College School debating club. Topic for debate will be "Resolved, that the requirement of membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment should be illegal."

McMaster visitors will be entertained at a reception in the Wymilwood Copper Room after the debate at Hart House Wednesday night.

Hold Gown Plebiscite Publishing Pros, Cons

The students of University College will be asked to vote next week on whether or not they want to wear academic gowns to lectures.

Jane Weber, vice-president of the UC Literary and Athletic Society, said last night the exact date of the referendum had not been set, but would be decided at an executive meeting Tuesday.

"However, we'll probably hold the voting on Friday," she said.

Miss Weber said arguments for and against the wearing of gowns will be mimeographed and circulated to students.

A resolution ordering the holding of a referendum was passed at a stormy meeting of the Lit last Tuesday afternoon.

Earlier in the meeting, a two to one vote of the packed house turned thumbs down on the wearing of gowns.

If students approve the wearing of gowns, the Faculty of the College will have to decide what methods of implementing the decision will be adopted, Miss Weber said.

Present Demand Petition Aimed At Ousting UC Lit

By HARVEY SHEPHERD
Varsity News Editor

A petition is to be submitted to the University College Literary and Athletic Society today calling on the present Lit executive to resign or, failing this, call an open Lit meeting where the complainants can "press their demands."

The petition is the latest outgrowth of a stormy Lit meeting last Tuesday which voted down a suggestion that UC undergraduates wear gowns—but later approved a motion to hold a college-wide referendum on the issue.

Between the two motions, a general exodus of students occurred, despite repeated pleas from the meeting's chairman, so that the referendum was approved by a house reduced about two-thirds.

Shelly Drebin (III UC), author of the petition, last night charged the action of the Lit executive in allowing the second motion to be put to the depleted house was "underhanded".

The present executive, headed by fourth-year student Bill Davis, is destroying the "liberal and democratic" traditions of UC, Drebin said.

Drebin said he has 75 names on a copy of the petition he has been circulating and there is another copy also in circulation.

Sixty signatories are sufficient to force the calling of an open meeting according to the Lit constitution. Two-thirds of them must be present at the meeting.

Lit president Bill Davis last night called the petition and the charges "foolish" and cited the constitutional problem which would be created by executive resignation.

Allowing the referendum move to be voted on was "obviously not underhanded," Davis said.

"We could neither have anticipated their making the motion," Davis said, "or prevented them from doing so, even if we wanted to."

Davis said if the sponsors of the petition were so intent on seeing the Lit do the right thing, they might have stayed to the end of the meeting.

"Let them throw us out of office," he said, "if they don't want a students' union, if they don't want an inquiry into student problems, if they don't want extra-curricular organization."

The original gown vote was not raised as a want-of-confidence issue, Davis said.

"If it were, the vote might have been different," he said.

The Lit constitution, Davis said, does not provide for the resignation or throwing-out of Lit executives.

There would be no returning officer to hold new elections, Davis said, as the elections for a school year's executive are usually held during the regime and under the direction of the previous executive.

Davis also said last night at least two other motions "far more important" than the gown issue had been passed at the meeting.

The meeting formed a committee to investigate staff-student relations, student bursaries and student housing and threw out a motion to censure Winnipeg's United College for the firing of Prof. Harry Crowe.

Drebin said his petition should "start the ball rolling."

"There's too much apathy in this college," he said.

Long To Midwife Pains Of Labor

Representatives of labor and management will get together in Hart House tonight to discuss "The Role of Organized Labor in the Canadian Economy".

The panel is sponsored by the U of T Commerce Club in an attempt to "give representatives of labor and management an opportunity to meet together informally and impart their views on the labor question to university students", club secretary Don Wilson said last night.

The meeting is also a major part of a Commerce Club-Ontario Agricultural College Economics Club exchange, Wilson said.

Speaking for labor on the panel will be William Dodge, executive vice-president of the Canadian Labor Congress, and Murray Cotterill, United Steelworkers of America publicity director.

Management consultant and lawyer Norman Mathews, and Alan Page, Goodyear Corp. personnel director will speak for management. Philosophy professor Marcus Long will chair the discussion.

Prof. Long will read written questions from the floor, Wilson said.

The panel will begin at 8 p.m. in the Hart House Debates Room. Women are invited.

Yank Girls Need Beds To Pillow Pretty Heads

The Hart House Glee Club is still looking for 70 beds to accommodate a visiting Rochester women's glee club.

"If we can't find enough beds we'll have to pay for hotel bills, and we just can't afford it," publicity director Terry Jabour said last night.

The beds are needed for Saturday night for members of the University of Rochester Women's Glee Club. About five students volunteered accommodations yesterday. Jabour said. Campus organizations have offered 10 more.

The girls will sing with the Hart House Glee Club and the U of T Mixed Chorus at a Tri-University concert Saturday at 8.30 p.m. in the Hart House Great Hall.

Program for the concert includes selections given independently by each choir, and three numbers sung by a joint choir of over 250 voices.

Tickets for the concert cost $1, and are available all this week at the Hart House hall porter's desk. Students offering accommodations for the visiting girls should contact the hall porter or the Hart House undergraduate office.

Picture Improving For Sagging AVR

Things are looking up for the All-Varsity Revue—but the picture is still far from rosy.

About 25 hopefuls turned up last night for "Have Toga, Will Travel" auditions in Howard Ferguson Hall. Only 10 students had appeared in the first two days of try-outs.

AVR producer Bill Lord said officials were no longer depressed about the lack of applicants, but "we're still not happy. We would like a large turnout so we can make a better choice in casting the show."

Last night's turn-out brings the grand total of auditioning students to 35. There are over 50 parts available in the original musical-comedy.

Those who tried out last night were of "much better quality", Lord said. "One thing we do need badly is male dancers", but no casting has been done for any of the parts, he said.

U of T's first original book-show is set in ancient Rome, in 58 A.D. It concerns the romantic and political problems of Emperor Nero, and ends happily when he finds a cultural solution to his troubles.

About 15 speaking roles and a 40-member mixed chorus are included in the two-hour show. Officials claim production plans are like nothing ever seen on the U of T campus. "We will use some very unusual effects", Lord said.

Tonight is the last chance for hopeful students to try their luck in auditioning for the show. Try-outs begin at 7.30 p.m. in the basement of Howard Ferguson Hall.

Officials hope for an "extra-large" turn-out," Lord said.

WUS Scholar Tells Of Hong Kong And State of Student Immigrants

A Chinese scholar working for the United Nations Educational, Social and Cultural Organization took a whirlwind tour of the U of T campus this weekend.

Geoffrey Huang, conducting an educational survey of American and Canadian universities for UNESCO, had exactly 24 hours in which to see the campus.

The visit, sponsored by the World University Service of Canada, included an evening meal and a Sunday morning chapel service in Trinity College.

Mr. Huang, a graduate of Chung Chi and Union Theological Colleges in Hong Kong, told an informal gathering Saturday night that out of the 3,000,000 population in Hong Kong, over one-half are immigrants.

The quota of 500 immigrants a day is filled mostly by refugees from Communist China, he said.

Mr. Huang, who has been instrumental in developing the WUS program of aid to student refugees in Hong Kong, said many student immigrants are earning only 30 cents a day.

When Mr. Huang said he hoped to learn about Toronto, students jokingly gave him a lively account of Canadian sports.

But they quickly settled down when he questioned them on current Canadian-American relations. As secretary of the Hong Kong WUS committee, Mr. Huang has travelled extensively in South-east Asia. Chinese expatriates living in Asia have greatly contributed to much-needed housing developments in Hong Kong, he said.

Huang flew to the University of New Brunswick Sunday to continue his tour of Canadian universities. He then returns to the United States where he has so far visited 25 universities.

Prof. McLuhan will be one of more than 3,000 English teachers from the United States, Canada, and several foreign countries discussing the teaching of the English language arts in American schools.

More than 75 University College students will today present to their student government a petition calling for its resignation or for an open meeting where they will have a chance to throw it out.

The heroic stupidity of this move may equal its infantile vindictiveness, but we doubt it.

And perhaps the most ironic fact about this ill-considered petition is that it springs indirectly from a motion proposed in a UC open meeting last week by a student who said it was not an issue worth getting self-conscious about.

Any of the signatories who may have attended the open meeting in question apparently sat stolidly through the first half-hour of the meeting and saw several motions—far more important than whether UC students should wear gowns—virtually rubber-stamped.

And we imagine a great many of those students who are now complaining about UC's "liberal and democratic traditions" being lost were among those who walked out directly after the gown vote—and before the referendum motion was put—although the meeting's chairman almost begged them to stay.

But 75 students are more than enough to force an open meeting. And 75 misguided students might be enough to pack a UC Literary and Athletic Society open meeting and throw out one of the more ambitious and competent student administrations we have seen.

We hope the students whose names are on this petition will shove it into the nearest wastebasket.

Because if an open meeting is forced, the Lit executive has no power to stop motions of any kind, even of impeachment—as was so clearly proved in the case of the referendum vote.

And therefore the time and energy of, say, 100 more or less sane UC students will be required at the open meeting the signatories demand—to give them the squashing they so richly deserve.

...and student apathy

Students on this campus have been accused of apathy time and time again.

But in four years, no one has dared to use the word in relationship to the issue of the All-Varsity Revue. For the voices screamed in unison: we want an original book show.

And they got it.

Now, out of a student body 13,000 strong, 35 have stepped forward to try out. They are not enough.

The naive authors who answered the call are confused. They cannot understand.

Neither can we.

Same Oogology

On Dadantics

By DON LEVY and PAUL HOCKINGS

the big piece of Oogoo. Thus Justice came into the world.

Being extraordinarily optimistic the infinite piece of Oogoo very sensibly decided to condense itself into a little piece of Oogoo, thus leaving the infinite piece of Nothing empty. The idea was to 'fix' the little bits of Oogoo.

Being now one of these, the infinite piece of Oogoo revealed an incredible lack of understanding for the mob-psychology he had created. So because he didn't wear a tie in the lounge and expressed vaguely Socialist opinions he died somewhat abruptly. The infinite piece of Oogoo didn't have time to fix itself.

This left a rather exciting position in the vacant infinity, where several other lumps of infinite Nothing began to jostle for position. They started campaigning, lobbying and propagandizing in order to gain power over the other pieces of infinite Nothing by democratic vote. But everyone pretended the original bit of Oogoo was still there.

Now having no infinite piece of Nothing to worship, they turned to worshipping the nearest remaining bit of Oogoo. This obviously was themselves. Thus they set a behavior pattern for all pious humanity that has accelerated to the present day.

It was also in the manner of infinite Nothing that these little bits of Oogoo should tend to disappear in a faint puff of pink smoke after travelling in ever-diminishing circles for about three score years and ten (known as the "good life").

This really disturbed the highly developed sense of carefully nurtured egotism in the remainder, who began to notice that there were now only empty spaces where previously there had been Nothing.

Being now convinced of the Beauty and Wisdom of Oogoo, they decided to construct pieces of invisible imaginary Oogoo to fill up the vacant space left by the late departed piece of Oogoo. These they decided to call "souls" because they were invisible bits of infinite Nothing. Thus each particular piece was assured that it would never really disappear in a puff of pink smoke, never at all.

Alas! This inspired theory proved empty, for the infinite piece of emptiness just got emptier, leaving pink stains all over the space-time metric.

Eventually it came to pass that only one fragment of Oogoo remained, called Adam for the sake of simplicity.

Being the sole existing piece of infinite Nothing, and thus being infinitely Wise and Good, Adam resolved to knock a chunk off himself. This he called Eve; and gave it subtle differences of shape and texture so that he could tell himself apart in the infinite Dark.

Thus Oogoo created Love. Oogooists mostly approve of this. Indeed, a latter-day Oogooist named Mendel gave himself a healthy if pointless livelihood by successfully predicting the products of a random clash between two pieces of assorted Oogoo. Clearly these are:

oogoo (pure bred) oogoo (fuschia-colored) googoo (cross-breeds)
gooog (recessive moron)

By dint of judiciously ill-advised parenthod, environment and heredity, these progeny were able to be marvellously distorted and complex-laden during oogoolescence.

Thus, malformed and maladjusted, they took their place with perfect ease in normal adult society.

Some violent skeptics will always maintain this is rather dubious; but Oogooists will always hasten to explain that it is entirely symbolic, and hence interpretable in several thousand ways...

Elder Skulemen Whip Dentistry Vic Tops Baby Engineers 13-0

Senior Skule and Victoria each recorded shutout victories yesterday to move into semi-final action in the Mulock Cup playoffs.

Engineers whipped Dentistry, 21-0, in the first game of the Varsity Stadium doubleheader, with Vic out-lasting a hard-fighting team of Baby Engineers in the nightcap, 13-0.

Senior SPS had little trouble with Dents.

Quarterback Derek Lunn counted one major, with Marino Basader and Nestor Sni-hura scoring the others. Sni-hura converted one TD, and Sam Clements and Don Robinson collected singles.

Playing on a muddy field, covered in places with sawdust, Skule held the Garnet and Blue at bay throughout most of the tilt. The teams had each finished third in their respective groups.

The second game was closer, with Vic beating down a game group of Skulemen to earn an increasing margin in play as the game progressed.

Mike Smith went around right end for the first Vic score after Bill Bell had broken through to block a Skule kick. Steve Moriarity converted.

The score remained 7-0 until the second half, when Mussle-man nailed a Skule halfback for a safety touch two yards inside the end zone.

Moriarity hoofed a 10-yard field goal to make it 12-0, and was credited with the final point when a 30-yard field goal try went low.

Senior Skule goes against defending champion Trinity on Thursday in one semi-final game, with Vic taking on University College Redmen in the other.

The winners meet in the Mulock Cup final — a regulation-time game — on Wednesday, November 26.

MULOCK CUP— This is the historic silverware up for grabs in the next nine days as four teams battle for the intramural football championship. Named for former Vice-Chancellor Sir William Mulock, the trophy was first presented in 1894.

Star Rookie Sensation Joyce Voted MVP In '58 Grid Season

By JOHN BROOKS
Varsity Sports' Editor

Pile-driving Varsity fullback Pete Joyce, whose first, last and only appearance in Intercollegiate senior football was the individual sensation of the 1958 season, was named the league's most valuable player last night.

He becomes the second recipient of the Omega Award, won last season by veteran Queen's Golden Gael halfback Ronnie Stewart, now toiling [?] with Ottawa Rough Riders of the Big Four.

Joyce receives a wrist watch in recognition of the honor accorded him, and his name will be engraved on the permanent Omega Award, a trophy which will rest alongside the Yates Cup for the next 12 months.

Coming to Varsity from Royal Military College, Kingston, Joyce needed only one game to establish himself as the prime example of crisp, bruising football action.

He met Western Mustangs head-on in the league opener, scoring two touchdowns and running for 149 yards in 22 carries.

From there on, the achievements and plaudits grew.

Joyce finished the year with nine touchdowns and second place in the individual scoring race behind team-mate Tim Reid. The 6'1", 210-pounder toted the pigskin a total of 134 times, and ran his net rushing to 903.

His best mark came in the Western game in London, when he carried 26 times for 210 yards, scored two touchdowns, and played a large part in Varsity's 46-0 victory.

A Toronto native who gained his collegiate schooling at West Hill High in Montreal, Joyce completed a three-year Engineering course at RMC while earning his commission as a lieutenant. He is completing fourth year of the course here.

Last season, he finished second to McMaster's Russ Jackson in Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Conference individual scoring, chalking up 90 points over the season. Jackson, an almost sure bet for Big Four rookie of the year with Ottawa, had 98.

Joyce was drafted last season by Ottawa, and should he decide to take a crack at professional football, will play his ball in the nation's capital. He is not eligible for the Canadian Rugby Union draft early next year.

Treasure Van's Returns "May Break The Bank"

Treasure Van should break the bank this year if present reports are a fair indication.

Mrs. Ethel Mulvany, director of the international sale and display sponsored by the World University Service of Canada, reports there has been no drop in sales intake from last year at the 12 Canadian universities so far visited.

Three Treasure Van trucks covering Eastern, Western, and Central Canada tour a total of 34 universities from mid-October until mid-December.

Returns from Mount Allison University and the Calgary Branch of the University of Alberta have almost doubled from 1957 figures. This year Mount Allison grossed an extra $1,000.

U of Saskatchewan returns are up one third, $1,500 more than last year's record, and the U of A. recorded a 10 per cent increase of $500.

Goal of the U of T Treasure Van from November 25-28 is $10,000.

Last year U of T collected only $4,000 from the sale, a drop of $2,000 from the previous year. This was generally attributed to the increase in prices.

But buyer Mrs. Mulvany says nothing can be done about prices.

Reasons for the increased prices include high customs, setting up contacts and buying goods in new countries, and the fact that Treasure Van is not only a display of foreign goods, but also a display.

In past years prices have ranged from a few cents for incense sticks up to $125 for an oriental chess set. The set was sold in Xavier College (Sydney, N.S.) last week.

Twenty-five per cent of the gross profit goes to WUS for its international relief program and scholarships for overseas students. The rest goes back into Treasure Van for new handicrafts and to offset the cost of breakage and other expenses.

Late Group Gathering Disrupted By Police

Metropolitan Toronto Police were called in Friday to quiet a disorderly meeting of the University of Toronto's esoteric clique, the Group of Five.

Constable Lloyd Gorgan said he was asked by neighbors to interfere with the group's noisy get-together Friday at a Dundas street restaurant about 5 p.m.

The group was meeting to hear F/O Gerald Selby, Royal Air Force (Ret.), speak on "T. E. Lawrence, Myth and Madman — as I know him."

Const. Gorgan said an upstairs resident asked him to investigate sounds of "shouting and alarm" which had been coming from the restaurant's private dining room since shortly after 4.30 p.m.

Const. Gorgan said he entered the restaurant and "made a routine check." He said he discovered about seven persons gathered in the back room, "shouting and yelling like crazy."

He said a man in RAF uniform was standing on a raised platform defending himself from a younger man who was apparently attempting to assault him.

"The assailant was a young, Arab-looking sort of fellow," the constable said.

He said that a later investigation proved the man being assaulted was F/O Gerald Selby. No charges were laid, Const. Gorgan said.

A member of the Group of Five last night said the incident occurred after F/O Selby described T. E. Lawrence as "a magnificent imposter and bounder to boot."

It was, the member said, "the most outspoken condemnation of a pseudo myth-figure he had ever heard."

The restaurant in which the incident took place is owned by Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Rickover.

WaitingGirl Has The Money Seeks "Student" Call

"Janie" is waiting for a phone call.

"Janie", or Anna Sissons, is a 14-year-old high school girl who offered to help five young men she thinks were U of T students sell balloons during last Saturday's Santa Claus Parade.

She has some money of theirs.

The students told Anna she would earn a dime for every 35-cent balloon she sold. After being assured there were no strings attached (to the deal), she agreed.

But she remembered her mother's advice not to give her name to strangers. Thus "Janie".

One of the five, with curly dark hair and glasses — she thinks may be named "Herb" or "Irv" — told Anna they would return to Westmoreland St. after the parade to pick up the money.

"Janie" sold all but one of her 21 balloons and returned to the meeting-place to wait. She huddled in a thin sky-blue raincoat in the pouring rain and waited.

And waited. And waited. And, after an hour, went home.

Anna's conscience, says her mother, Mrs. J. M. Sissons, is stricken because she has $5 and they aren't hers.

The police can't help her — selling balloons without a licence isn't officially allowed — even if the police sometimes look the other way. Float parade officials can't help either. Anna is sure the boys were university students.

Wearing Skule jackets?

Well no, she says. But you can always tell university students. (Tho' you can't tell 'em much.) They're sort of — well, you know — different.

The owners of the money are asked to phone HU. 5-7032. Ask for Janie.

A comprehensive plan to guarantee education to all worthy Ontario students was made public last night by President Claude Bissell.

Free tuition plus financial help would be granted all high school students with first class honors in Grade 13. Financial help would be given second class honor students.

Students would move from one category to the other if their academic standing changed during their university career.

Under the plan, which would cost the U of T alone $1,500,000, no help is given third class honor students.

The proposal was contained in an unofficial report by the President's Advisory Committee on Student Aid, chaired by Vice-president Murray Ross. Representatives of the university's principal divisions made up the committee.

President Bissell made no comment on the report pending study by all sections of the university.

The report also advocates sweeping changes in the time limit of the academic year. It would reduce the five-month vacation period to two months and substitute a Sept. 1 to June 30 schedule. There would be a week holiday at Thanksgiving and a month off at Christmas and Easter.

The report was presented Friday to the University senate and to the heads of other Ontario universities Monday.

The committee had no faith loan funds to aid university students. It suggests loans should only be used to help students meet emergencies.

The committee also recommends the "huge patchwork" of scholarships, bursaries and "funds" already available be co-ordinated and reduced evenly.

Administration of the program, probably involving means test and making a highly trained staff necessary, will be in the hands of each university. The provincial Department of Education would inform the university chosen by the student of the student's standing in Grade 13.

The report's recommendation in full:

- Free tuition for first-class honor students in nine Grade 13 papers suitably distributed as to subject plus variable bursary aid according to the student's need;

- Similar bursaries for second class honors students;

- No help for third class honor students unless they later attain second or first class honors;

- A special ways and means committee be established to examine the present variety of bursaries and loans.

- All donors and potential donors to the university be told that the university's need for financial assistance increases as its enrolment increases;

- Special study be given to the length of the university term in order to establish a term which is educationally sound and not affected by considerations which are out of date.

- Conferences be held with other Ontario universities, and with the provincial and federal government.

The new academic year would not increase lectures in courses but would give students more time to rest and reappraise their work. Work would be assigned in holiday periods.

Purpose of the aid plan is to encourage the best students in Ontario to continue their studies. Lacking assurances of aid, the report says, many good students drop out of high school and are lost to universities.

UofO Hopes Dim
At Dean's Refusal

OTTAWA — CUP — Hopes for the reinstallation of three La Rotonde editors grew dimmer last night at the University of Ottawa when official refusal came through from Dean of Students Rev. Leonard Ducharme.

Students' Council President Marcel Prud'homme received a two-page letter of refusal at about 9 p.m. in which Father Ducharme blamed "the motives behind the students' resolution" as the main reason for his decision.

The letter came as a reply to demands by the council at a Nov. 11 meeting for reinstallation of editors Louis Cliche, Roger Roy and Pierre Trudel. The editors were dismissed from office by administrative authorities Oct. 24.

Father Ducharme denied charges by the council that "the motion by the university entailed complete negation of students' liberty of action" and was on attempt "to smother student organization as a whole".

"No attempt has been made to suppress the students' organization or associations whether on the faculty plan or on the federation plan," Father Ducharme said.

"I was hoping the university's position had been made sufficiently clear during the interview I gave to students' council members to protect the university against just such statement", he added.

Father Ducharme said the students' federation has grown in status since its formation but has never been recognized by the administration as a necessary intermediary in staff-student problems.

"The rights and obligations conceded the federation by the university are accompanied by certain obligations and responsibilities and the university reserves its right to see that these are respected", he said.

He accused the three editors concerned of lacking "elementary understanding of their journalistic responsibilities" and said he was forced to render the council powerless when it offered them its support.

The student press must remain a very special sector of the press in general, he said, and has no right at any time to claim the rights of professional papers.

"The University encourages freedom of expression in student newspapers", Father Ducharme continued, "as long as they stay within the limits of authentic journalism".

Duplessis Offers Aid

QUEBEC, Nov. 20 — Quebec Premier Maurice Duplessis yesterday reaffirmed his intention of not allowing federal money to enter the province for aid to education, but announced increased aid to students through loans.

The statements were contained in a speech from the throne read at the opening of the third session of the 25th Quebec Legislature here.

Increased help for university students was announced last August after the premier received a small student group called the University Action League.

The aid plan will take the form of loans which will start to bear interest a few years after the student leaves university.

Union Boss Claims Members Voluntary

A Hart House audience of men and women Tuesday night hissed and booed a labor representative who said labor unions are all "voluntary organizations."

William Dodge, executive vice-president of the Canadian Labor Congress was participating in a panel discussion on the role of organized labor in Canada's economy in front of a packed Hart House Debates Room.

The panel, moderated by U of T management consultant and Alan philosophy professor Marcus Long, Page, personnel director of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co. of Canada, also included Murray Cotterill, publicity director of the United Steelworkers of America, Norman Mathews, Toronto lawyer and

Mr. Dodge said: "the fact nothing on God's green earth can stop employees from walking off the job is evidence enough unions are free organizations."

Mr. Cotterill said unions have proven beyond doubt that productivity has increased "leaps and bounds" over workers' wages.

Mr. Page retorted the "constant hickering" of unions for a greater share of profits tends towards an unhealthy economy through the production of inferior goods.

Mr. Mathews said unions enjoy all the privileges of a corporate entity under the law but often fail to live up to the obligations.

Mr. Dodge admitted unions in the past have been dictatorial and corrupt. "Nevertheless," he said, "workers hold the axe of walkout over the heads of their labor bosses if union policies get out of line with worker demands."

The average worker today works about as hard as he did in the past, he said. "But because a man is paid 16 times more now for shovelling snow in no reason he should have to work 16 times harder."

Mr. Page retorted "most industrial profits go back into the modernization and improvement of machinery."

Mr. Mathews said unions, unlike companies, have not been incorporated and can not be sued when they back out of contracts.

Mr. Cotterill pinned the recent inflation and recession on "industrialists who, thinking the market can take more, capitalize on the country's inflated position by boosting prices."

Wage increases always follow price increases, he said.

A proposed CCF-Canadian Labor Congress merger, he said, would not only give labor a means of political expression but "bring labor questions before the people as a whole."

When Mr. Page charged labor unions are "destroying companies," Mr. Dodge cited the coal mining industry where, he said, labor unions joined with management to keep that industry alive.

Mr. Dodge said bad times have hit pensioners and non-union members harder than organized labor. "The union member must expect to give up some cost and time in return for these privileges," he said.

from a Japanese prison camp...

Treasure Van: A Dream Comes True

By VICKY INNES
Varsity Staff Reporter

The germ of the idea for Treasure Van was conceived in a Japanese prisoner-of-war camp during the second World War where a Canadian woman was confined for almost four years.

She was isolated from the western world but for the occasional parcels of food and books sent by American universities. This woman emerged from the prison camps with a burning ambition to somehow ease international tensions.

Meanwhile, in Canada, a women's group organized a small annual sale of foreign handicrafts.

In 1952, World University Service of Canada was ready to cancel plans for a summer seminar in India because of limited funds.

These separate incidents merged and the idea became a reality when the ex-POW heard of WUSC's plight. Thinking perhaps of the war years she decreed the seminar should proceed as planned.

With the co-operation of WUSC, she proposed a reorganization of the woman's group handicraft sale into an international display and sale of handicrafts.

And so Treasure Van was born.

Mrs. Ethel Mulvany was the woman with the idea. Treasure Van was the "international bazaar". It is a fund raising branch of WUSC, which annually tours Canadian universities from coast to coast.

Since its official founding in 1952, Treasure Van has undergone rapid growth and development.

The countries represented in the tour have increased from one to 22. These include 12 major countries: India, Greece, Jordan, Japan, Mexico, Malaya, Jamaica, Germany, Canada, Thailand, Peru and Brazil, each with exhibits worth more than $10,000. This year marks the first appearance of any work from Thailand, Peru or Brazil in the Van. Next year's plans are to include Colombia, Ecuador, Chile, Bolivia, Spain and Iran.

Canada is not the only country to boast a Treasure Van. Last year England, the Netherlands, Holland and Germany hopped on the bandwagon with their own vans.

As a buyer, Mrs. Mulvany has her own method of establishing contact with prospective exhibiting countries. Firmly convinced that "it is the people who know the real art of a country," she attends, if possible, several lectures of the local university's art department, then visits the Chamber of Commerce. Only then does she call on the Canadian Embassy.

The exhausting job of directing Treasure Van would overwhelm most people, but it seems second nature for the determined Mrs. Mulvany.

"In my job," she says, "one has to know a few words of each language, and sign language does dictate. Such is the case with a $75, 2,000 year old Grecian vase, made with materials and craftsmanship more perfect than could be found today.

On the other hand, Peruvian candy is handed out free for visitors to sample.

Although university tours end in mid-December, Treasure Van drivers will visit public and high schools on request until the summer when they tour Banff and other summer schools. Next on the itinerary are buying tours lasting until mid-August.

This fast-growing endeavour is organized under the jurisdiction of WUSC. But on each campus, a committee is elected to organize the local tour, arrange publicity, finance, personnel and displays.

wonders. But I really blush when I think of the French I taught many years ago."

But she makes up for it in her "slight" knowledge of Hindi, Urdu, Japanese, Malayan, Chinese, German, Iroquois and Spanish.

Her memory is a storehouse not only for languages and names of persons and places but also the traditions and myths of the countries she has visited.

Sale material comes to the 53-year-old director in strange ways. One of her favorite tales concerns the tiny, delicately carved ivory elephants from India which are a regular Treasure Van feature.

They were made, she says, by an old Indian she saw sitting on a sidewalk busy carving the animals. She ordered twelve but became so enchanted by his work that she increased the order to 1,200.

She found later that the poverty stricken man had garnered the chips from the streets.

Some articles are intended for display as their prices would include. There is a co-ordinating tour supervisor for the three areas of Canada. Mrs. Mulvany forms the main link between the separate campus committees and WUSC, buying goods, arranging tours and dates and setting prices.

Prices are fixed in relation to a co-operative plan with WUSC. Of the one-third mark-up on each article, roughly 25 per cent goes to WUSC projects. These include an international student relief program of hostels and medical and tuberculosis centres in underdeveloped countries and scholarships for overseas students in Canada.

The remaining 75 per cent going back into Treasure Van covers cost of breakages, publicity, customs duties, and new materials.

AMID THE JUMBLE of boxes and cartons in the Treasure Van warehouse, this carved reindeer is just one of the many foreign handicrafts that will go on sale when the World University Service Treasure Van opens in Howard Ferguson Hall Tuesday afternoon. Proceeds go to WUSC special projects to aid needy students in underprivileged countries.

Must Hold Standards -Bissell

U of T President Claude T. Bissell appealed for financial support for Canada's universities yesterday.

But the university's standards must not be lowered in an attempt to attract capital, he warned.

The university must not become a technological training ground, he said. Neither must it "be turned into a vast reservoir for containing all those who desire some form of education beyond the secondary school level.

"If our Canadian universities, now high in the ranks of centres of learning, abandon their concept of excellence, they will weaken both themselves and the nation and they will cease to be a force in fashioning a mature and durable national spirit."

Only once in a very great while does society, confronted with the inevitable, do anything but shout about it until it's too late to accomplish a change without a minor or major revolution.

Free university tuition is inevitable in the society which is developing today. Various bodies have been shouting about it for the last ten years. But the few constructive proposals that have been put forward have usually ignored the interests of society as a whole.

Yesterday's report by President Bissell's Advisory Committee suggesting free tuition to first class honors students in Ontario is radical but realistic, comprehensive yet simple.

Intelligently presented with careful consideration of all the factors involved, the report is a practical answer to all the demands of society.

The Committee's recommendations may well raise some minor objections. We ourselves would question the implicit assumption that Grade 13 first class honors students in Ontario's high schools, are top university material.

But in view of the report's over-all excellence, this is a mere quibble over decorations on a very substantial cake.

We only hope the report will be recognized by society as cake to be eaten now. If it is rejected and ignored, a far less edible humble pie will be crammed down our throats in ten or fifteen years.

intellectual rabble

The formation of cliques, essentially anti-social and undemocratic in nature, seem an inevitable thing in a university—especially a large one such as ours.

But they are not desirable. The damage they may do to the individuals who "belong", through their being cut off from the many-colored flow of campus life, is nothing to the damage done the forlorn individual who can never be "in."

For he who cannot be "in" there is shame, embarrassment, a perpetual consciousness of inferiority, a gnawing loneliness.

Trinity College, they say, abounds with cliques, cliques of the worst sort. And keen observers of the University College scene say there are as many, perhaps more, there as anywhere else.

Traditionally, the one who can never be "in" has sought his own standards, his own truths without the cloying warmth of the mob. In short, he has been a rebel, he has fought alone and come out best in the end.

But now a new phenomenon occurs—the rebel clique itself—and all chance is gone. The individual who knows no rule for getting "in" is finally, irrevocably, "out."

Such a dangerous clique has raised its head on our campus. It calls itself, pretentiously, the Group of Five. It spends its time viewing "arty" films, attending special "off-beat" lectures, arranging trips, discussing erotic and illicit literature.

Now two things are clear about this organization. First, its members, however many there may be, are wealthy and wasteful young people. They are people who have no place in the run of campus life. They have taken President Bissell's plea for "angularity" and abused it without taste or intelligence.

Secondly, they cannot be allowed to continue, uncorrected, in their destructive and petty ways.

Only when the full, hot light of society's condemnation is focused on the membership of this band, only when it is clear to them that they have severed with the community in which they live and are alone and despised, only then will their idiosyncrasy be discontinued and only then will the members return to a useful place in the full, rich flow of life.

Committee's Report

Student Aid Plan

Below are excerpts from a report by President Bissell's Advisory Committee on Student Aid. The committee, chaired by U. of T. vice-president Murray Ross, spent eight months working on the report. It has been approved in principle by the Senate of the university and is under examination by heads of other Ontario universities.

The needs...

Three aspects of the present situation are highly unsatisfactory. First, there are not sufficient student aid monies available to provide the amount of help required by all the worthy students seeking help.

Secondly, the haphazard provisions for students in need have led to the creation of a huge patchwork of scholarships, bursaries and loan funds, governed by such a variety of conditions that it may be a matter of chance rather than merit if a good student with meagre monetary resources receives all the help he requires. We may have a bursary available for a graduate of X High School even though no graduate of that school has a particular need for a bursary; and, at the same time, we may have no funds available to help a worthy student from Y High School who is in great need of money.

Thirdly, as a result of the situation outlined above, there is the fact that we are not able to say unconditionally to a very good student in the second or third year of high school: "Keep on with your studies; if you continue to do well, we will help you to come to university." Lacking such assurance, many good students drop out of high school and are lost to the universities.

What data we have indicate clearly that we require: (a) additional monies for student aid programmes, (b) relatively flexible conditions governing the monies available so that individual needs may be met, and (c) firm public assurance to all students of merit that adequate financial help is available to them to complete their university work. As enrolment begins to climb in the university, it is essential that our position in respect of these matters be clarified.

Two considerations are of importance if the quality of education in the university is to be maintained or improved. The first is the need to retain and enlarge a highly competent staff with sufficient time to meet individual students, with opportunity for study and writing, and with adequate equipment for research and teaching.

The university should remind contributors (private or governmental) that the university is required to find two-thirds of the cost of education of every student.

Length of term...

Any expansion of student aid programmes which permits more and better students to attend universities must be accompanied by substantial increases in contributions to the universities. There is no point in providing inducements to better students to attend poorer universities.

The second consideration affecting the quality of education is the length of the academic term. This has been determined by social and economic conditions and not by any rules of pedagogy or principles of education. The long summer vacation, traditional for Canadian universities, may provide students with an opportunity of securing temporary employment and thereby earning some money for their education, but its value in a total education programme may be seriously questioned.

If finances were not the predominant consideration a more effective academic term might begin on September 1st, with a week off at Thanksgiving, four weeks off at Christmas and four weeks off at Easter, and end on June 30th. The student would spend no more time in the classroom, but his periods for rest, recapitulation and reappraisal would be more fittingly spaced, and he would not, during his breaks from class work, be without assignments. Such a schedule might well make also for more effective teaching. The teacher's task of maintaining interest and enthusiasm in ten or twelve classes a week for a period of thirty weeks without a substantial period for rest is an extremely difficult one.

It will be argued that students should have time to earn money so that they may make a contribution to their own education. Without denying the importance of the experience the student gains in summer work, one may question whether it is sound economics for a student to spend five months earning eight hundred to twelve hundred dollars, of which he may save for his education from three to five hundred dollars, if thereby he is reducing the effectiveness of his educational programme in which over fifteen hundred dollars is invested annually. It may well be that reorganization of our university term should be considered. Certainly any new programme of student aid should have the effect of enhancing the quality of higher education.

The projected programme of student aid should be framed so as to encourage the student to devote himself unceasingly to his studies. This is the primary effort we should expect from the student; for while he should contribute financially to whatever extent he can, academic effort and achievement should, and must, be the major criteria of whether a student should be in university. If we accept this conclusion, we must resolve to find the means to remove financial blocks to higher education.

The means by which this objective is to be secured is not, we believe, a loan fund, however large or however free of restrictive conditions. A student without other resources might be required to borrow as much as four thousand dollars to finance a programme of study at university. For a student from a home in which the annual income is below this amount, such a loan would seem entirely impractical. Loan funds are useful to help students meet emergency situations; such funds by themselves will do little to attract all superior high school students to university.

The good student, even the First Class Honour student, cannot count on this assistance when he is deciding (often in January or February) whether to go to university or not. It is essential, therefore, that a plan be developed that will guarantee to all high school students in Ontario that if they attain a given academic standard they will receive sufficient financial help to permit them to attend university, and—if they maintain this standing—to complete their studies. A plan by which all First Class Honour students would be provided with free tuition and bursaries in an amount related to their financial need would, we are convinced, do much to remedy the unsatisfactory situation which prevails today. If such a plan were implemented no First Class Honour student would need to drop out for financial reasons. All such students would be assured of ready access to, and full support in, the university of their choice. This proposal would involve no more expense than many countries already incur for their youth. Its adoption would indicate that Ontario accepts the social obligation to develop fully our human potentialities and talents.

One other point requires elaboration. This has to do with the administrative machinery and personnel required to operate an extensive student aid programme. The administration of a bursary and loan fund is a problem of considerable complexity.

It is wasting a university professor's time to ask him to make judgments about a student's financial need. This is not a matter with which the academician is trained to cope. A means test should be made either by a public body (as in Great Britain) or by a special university administrative staff trained for this purpose. The magnitude of the task of administering this means test in the future is evident; for example, if approximately half of the students in university require some financial aid in 1968, about 12,000 students will be applying for help at the University of Toronto.

SKULE NITE

Your reviewers, tonight, sat through a rather shoddy production of "Skule Nite". Despite highlights which were thoroughly enjoyed, the slow pacing even apathy of the performers "left us cold". The script was good; some performers were excellent, as were several acting and dancing routines—especially SHHHH!, The Commercial Side of Life, Moon Maidens and Cut of the Cow.

Also of note, were Bill Lord's sets. But the drive, so essential to a show of this kind was missing. This fault was due to the poor direction which failed to correct poor timing, laboured lines, pacing of most routines and also, failed to instill, in the actors, the desire to transmit to the audience a sense of enthusiasm, enjoyment and participation which must come from the intense personal enjoyment of the performers themselves. The poor pacing of the skits was even more noticeable, when contrasted with the short, well-timed entre-acts, which kept alive a little spark of audience interest.

The second 'half' got off to a better start, with the best act of the show—"Cut of the Cow" which act should have ended the production because the final routine lacked the punch which so characterized 'Cut of the Cow'.

Bob Zacharczuk and Tom Reider who appeared many times, deserve special credit for giving the only performances which, consistently, captured the audience. Perhaps the best feature, in the individual acts, was the use of gimmicks, as in 'Employment' in which we were unexpectedly treated to harem dancing girls, trumpet fanfare and a medieval herald. Later on, we found ourselves watching a silent western film, also an instrument panel, in the final act, flashing appropriate phrases such as "tilt" and "good grief"—words which expressed our sentiments about the singing of the Skule House Chorus.

With the exception of the above mentioned chorus, which we feel should be cut, the music of the orchestra and of the Skule House Four made up for many a deficiency and was the real hit of the production. They alone had the enthusiasm, polish and electrifying quality which rescued Skule Nite from its general tedium.

Flamenco 'sin alma'

The audience at Eaton Auditorium on Monday evening seemed to have the greatest difficulty in keeping still. It was as if they were afflicted with some disease which caused muscles to twitch, toes and heels to tap and fingers to beat out incomprehensible rhythms. For any other performer, such an audience reaction might have been a bad sign, but for Carlos Montoya, the flamenco guitarist, it was an expected response. It is almost impossible for the flamenco 'aficionado' to sit quietly as he listens. The beat is far too insistent, the rhythms too basic.

By basic, one does not necessarily mean simple. On the contrary, many flamenco patterns are highly complex. They depend to a large extent on syncopation, and on a structure which combines melodic line with a twelve beat rasqueado, achieved by brushing the backs of the fingernails across the strings—thus producing the characteristic flamenco sound.

The greatest degree of complexity occurs when the underlying rhythm pursues its own pattern, while maintaining an intricate counterpoint structure with the melodic line. It can be understood why flamenco is virtually impossible to write down. In any case, the flamenco guitarist relies on his own improvisations or 'falsetas' with which he surrounds and embellishes the standard rhythm.

The essence of flamenco is its spontaneity, and the fact that it springs from the heart. It is passionate music. It fires the blood and makes you want to laugh and cry, dance and sing, all at once. But whether it was the setting of the concert hall which seemed, somehow, to be quite irrelevant to music like this, there was something missing. Montoya's music made the heart beat faster and the feet tap, but it did not sing of nostalgia and sorrow. The flamenco player in his natural habitat is surrounded by dancers, swinging skirts, flashing eyes, and the sound of the castanets, but Montoya was alone on a bare stage facing an immobile audience, who, despite their devotion, could do no more than clap their appreciation when the music was over. Perhaps he felt that the gypsy sadness might be uncommunicable to a passive audience, or perhaps he did not feel it himself, but only the fury and energy of his native music. In any case, one did not feel that sense of haunting grief which is inextricably bound up with the life and spirit of a people.

Whatever he may have lacked in this respect, he made up in other ways. His fingers are long and immensely strong. The tremolos, played by plucking the same string with three fingers in rapid succession, were powerful and even. In his improvisations he demonstrated incredible agility, with soaring and plunging arpeggios whose symmetry in speed was spectacular. And Montoya managed to produce a most unlikely range of sounds from his guitar. In Saeta, which is a song sung during Holy Week in Sevilla, he imitated an entire military, ending on a simulated roll of drums which could hardly be distinguished from the real thing. Tarantas, called "cante jondo", or "soul music", was almost impressionistic. The guitar ceased to play a clearly defined tune and instead, began a quivering nebulous humming which muttered and grumbled in the lower octaves, and hovered in the upper scales like the flight of an Andalusian bumble bee. In the Bulerias, he accentuated the rhythm with finger tapping, and in Zambra, beat out the rhythm with his hand on the resonant body of the guitar below the bridge, as if it were a bongo drum.

By the time Montoya reappeared after the second intermission he was greeted with exuberant cries in Spanish from the back of the hall. One felt that he should really be back in the Café Cantantes of Madrid, where he was directing the show at the age of fourteen. Flamenco is too tempestuous an art form for the concert stage.

Elizabeth Harrison.

Old Vic Co.

The Old Vic Company of London will be appearing in Toronto next week, with three of Shakespeare's most famous plays: Twelfth Night, Henry The Fifth and Hamlet.

The brilliant English company will be headed by John Neville, Laurence Harvey, Barbara Jefford and Margaret Courtenay.

PICTURE CREDITS:

Left: Barbara Jefford, who will appear as Ophelia in "Hamlet" and Viola in "Twelfth Night".

Right: Margaret Courtenay, who will play Gertrude in "Hamlet".

Below: John Neville in the title role of "Hamlet".

uc players' guild

The University College Players' Guild has this year inaugurated a new policy in their presentation of one-act plays.

Radically departing from plays by established authors, such as Saroyan and Strindberg, the Guild has decided to present original plays by students at the university.

The first production will be Tree By The Gate, by Dave Helwig (UUC). It will have its premiere tonight and tomorrow night at the Women's Union Theatre, along with the film, The Stratford Adventure. It will be followed in December by Michael Nimchuk's Footsteps On The Sand. Admission is 50 cents.

BOOR WAR

In Love and in War imperialism is Jerry Peyton Place. Wald's spectacular mistreatment of a capable war novel by Anton Myrer.

In what is probably the most stupendous avalanche of clichés to hit the screen since the last major war film was released, Producer Wald sends a pair of talented young actors floundering through a tasteless, pointless and coarse excursion into neo-realism. The naughty words "hell" and "damn" are sprinkled like matinee popcorn through the Farbny script and enough riddled bodies litter the screen to satisfy Genghis Khan. Both the love and war are served up so raw as to be offending and in the end the whole film goes gorging noisily down the vulgar drain of commercialism.

The labyrinth-like storyline involves the home and away activity of three Marines (Robert Wagner, Bradford Dillman and Jeffrey Hunter) and their respective femmes (Sheree North, Dana Wynter, France Nuyen, Hope Lange). In Frisco, the action is sexy in a simple, sweet way; in the Pacific, it is just sweaty. The viewer is ultimately left with the impression that while war is hell, movies about it are even worse.

Almost everything that could be done wrong the moviemakers have done wrong in this production. Each character, action and motive is painted in shrieking monochrome; the newsreel clips of Marine landings are clumsily inserted and the whole conglomerate shambles aimlessly toward a sloppy conclusion.

Generally, it's all pretty real in a disgusting way.

3 Choirs on Campus

Once again the Hart House Glee Club will play host to two visiting choirs at its eighth annual Tri-University Concert. It will take place this Saturday, November 22, at 8:30 p.m. in the Great Hall at Hart House. Guests this year are the University of Rochester Women's Glee Club, and the University of Toronto Chorus.

The Women's Glee Club, directed by Ward Woodbury, now numbers 85 voices, and includes in its repertoire varied works from Bach to musical comedy. In past years the girls have sung with the Colgate and Syracuse Men's Glee Clubs. Last Spring they presented a concert in Hamilton, arousing enthusiastic comment.

The U. of T. Chorus is a mixed group of around 100 voices. Directed by Prof. A. R. Johnston, this is the only choir on the campus which includes men and women from all schools. On November 22, the girls will be singing at a concert in Convocation Hall, sponsored by S.A.C., and open to all students.

The host club is a well-known chorus of 25 male voices. They have performed on radio and television in the past, and have given concerts throughout Ontario and New York State. The club is directed by Rowland Pack, and will pay a return visit to Rochester in the New Year.

At the Tri-U, each choir will give a separate performance, and three times during the evening they will combine to present numbers with all 240 voices joining in. One of the combined pieces, the Magnificat by Gabrieli was written especially for three choirs—male, female and mixed—and so will fit in perfectly. For this selection—the choruses will split up two singing from the balcony and the other from the stage.

Other numbers on the varied programme will be "There is Nothing Like a Dame" from South Pacific, and Holiday Song by William Schuman.

Tickets for the concert are on sale in Hart House from the Hall Porter, at $1.00 each.

Time Going Fast On Photo Contest

Campus photographers have only one more week to enter the National Federation of Canadian University Students' annual photography contest. Prizes range from $10 to $300 and a number of honorable mentions will be awarded.

A total of 18 pictures may be submitted for judging. Three pictures may be entered in each of the following categories; color, animals, sports and action, news and human interest, portraiture, and pictorial.

Entry blanks are available at the Students' Administrative Council office, and entries may be submitted at the SAC office or the Hart House hall porter's desk until Sunday, Nov. 30.

Any student enrolled at U of T is eligible for the contest.

"For some reason, entrants from this university have been almost exclusively male," U of T contest chairman Ron Carr said last night.

"We would like to see more girls taking part," he said.

University Staffers Will Try For Trusteeships

For the first time next month two trusteeships for Toronto's Board of Education will be contested by U of T staff members.

Dr. R. S. Harris, assistant professor of English at University College and K. S. Gregory, accountant for U of T's Athletic Association will campaign in two of the nine wards at stake in the Dec. 1 election.

Dr. Harris, ward two candidate, has taught at UC since 1952. He was formerly on the faculties of the Universities of Michigan and Western Ontario. He has a BA and MA from Toronto and PhD from Michigan.

Dr. Harris will be opposed by Mrs. Kent Barker, wife of Dr. R. J. K. Barker of the Archeology department; Hudson Stowe, comptroller of the Manufacturer's Life Insurance Co., and member of Trinity College Convocation; and Howard Smith, an electrician.

Gregory has been with the Athletic Association and ticket manager of Varsity Stadium since 1946. He was educated at Lindsay Public School and Collegiate Institute in Toronto and will stand for election in ward two.

He will be opposed by Sidney Midanik, a lawyer and former member of the board and Phillip Ambrose, also of Toronto.

Two trustees are elected to each Toronto ward for a two-year term. Positions are voluntary and require about 12 hours work a week.

Dr. Harris said he feels part of a trustee's job is to interpret for his constituents what is happening in Toronto schools.

"I feel if I go out and explain what is being done, people will take more interest in school activities," he said.

Gregory has set the Board of Education as his political objective.

"But it is not my intention to use election to the Board as a stepping stone to other political office," he said. "The crisis in education is still very much with us and it will be my aim, if elected, to help maintain and when possible to raise the present high standard of education in Toronto schools," he said.

BLUES GAIN DRAW IN PRELIM

Varsity Show Weak Spots Give Away 5 To Lyndies

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

The East Toronto Lyndhursts, outclutched, outgrabbed, and outscrambled the Varsity Blues, to garner a 5-5 overtime tie at the Arena Tuesday night.

It was a friendly affair. Body contact was almost exclusively limited to some good natured jostling, shoving, elbowing, hooking, and slashing.

Lyndies opened the scoring at 26 seconds of the first period. Blair Graham, on an unassisted play, floated the first shot of the game past the shoulder of Varsity goalie Ray Dunn.

Blues tied it up at 10:37 on a goal by Don Fleming. A pretty passing play by Jim Brooks and Howie Roth set up the score.

Blues took the lead on the only goal scored in the second frame. Bill Kennedy blazed one home on a two way passing rush from Brian Anderson.

The third period saw greatly improved hockey. Both clubs resorted to a faster, freer-skating game.

Lyndhursts surged ahead on two quick goals. Ron Scarcello garnered the first unassisted and Joe Reimer sank the next. Bob Cheviva and John Curtis assisting.

Varsity retaliated midway through the period with two quickies of their own. John Macdonald potted the first from close in. Harry Neale assisted on the score.

A minute later Mike Elik flipped a quick pass to Lorry Stacey at the Varsity blue line. Stacey broke away unmolested, to score with a low hard shot at 9:06 of the period.

Lyndhursts tied it up half a minute later with an almost identical breakaway, Graham doing the honors on an assist by John McKenzie.

Four of the game's six minor penalties were handed out in the final half of the third period, as play became a shade rougher.

Upon due deliberation, both clubs agreed to continue play for a ten-minute overtime period to decide a winner.

Although Jack Kennedy had experimented with different line combinations throughout the game, the most erratic Blues' line change came to the opener of the overtime period. Defensemen Neale and Stacey combined with center Mike Elik as a forward line.

Neale scored from Stacey on a picture rushing play at 2:29 of the period.

The never-say-die Lyndies, playing with a man short on a holding penalty to Bernie Christie, tallied the equaliser on a goal by McKenzie from Scarcello.

Final shots on goal; by Varsity 48, by Lyndhursts 25.

The outstanding player on the ice was a Varsity toiler devoting his services to the Lyndies' cause. Bob Giroux, Blues' second net-minder, was on loan to the Lyndhursts for this game. In blocking 48 shots, Giroux turned in a stellar performance, robbing Blues' sharpshooters of at least six goals.

Individually, Blues left very little to be desired. As a team, however, they are several games away from being a polished unit. The attacking lines will take some time and effort to realize full scoring potential. Serious defensive lapses in every position may very well cost them even more goals in faster company.

Just Notes: The Lyndies, operating in the East York Intermediate A loop, have currently won all five of their league games.

Harry Neale predicted a Varsity goal in the first minute of play in the overtime period. Got it himself too — nice calling Harry!

Varsity Rugger League Champs

The Varsity rugger Blues won the Ontario Rugger Union Intermediate A League title last weekend defeating St. Catharines 8-3, while Guelph Ontario Agricultural College upset the league-leading Toronto Irish by the same score.

The results put Varsity, OAC and Irish in a three-way tie for first place, each with identical 5-2 won-lost records for the season.

But the senior Blues copped the league title by virtue of a superior points-for-and-against percentage on the season's play. OAC edged out Irish on percentage for the second spot. St. Catharines took fourth in the eight-team loop.

Varsity and OAC now meet Saturday in the Intermediate A play-off, the winner will clash with the playoff winners of the Intermediate B League in the Carling Cup all-Ontario intermediate final.

Coach Dr. David Penman, whose efforts played a large part in the Blues' league title win, will most likely stay with the same team for Saturday's playoff.

Dr. Penman, University of Edinburgh graduate and former Royal Navy rugby player, is leaving Toronto at the end of the week on academic commitments in Halifax.

The Girls' Grid Game By A Halfback Herself

By LAUREL BALL
Varsity Staff Reporter

An increasingly popular girls' sport on the Varsity campus is in the process of completing its third successful season.

The sport is touch football.

Since its inception in 1956 when only two teams played, it has developed into competition among four teams. A rough estimate of 80 girls are fielded by the combined faculties of Victoria, P&OT, University College, and St. Hilda's.

No athletic credits are given for practices or games. Yet over six dozen female footballers participate because:

a) girls take great delight in attempting something they know next to nothing about.

b) they can borrow the boys' sweaters for their games.

c) there is something particularly feminine about saying that one plays tackle for a football team.

To the amused spectator, the girls' game appears as organized mayhem. Strict precautions are taken, however, to ensure the safety of the players. Tackling is taboo. A two-handed touch below the waist suffices. There are no shooting linebackers, and the opposition must not rush the kicker.

A certain percentage of people frown on girls' football, just as the Victorians frowned on short hair, short skirts, and bathtub gin.

In its favour, it may be pointed out that team play, such an integral part of the plegkin game, gives to the players a better idea of co-operation and co-existence. This, combined with a clearer understanding of the Blues' offensive and defensive tactics, makes the sport thoroughly worthwhile.

Who previously knew what an off-tackle play was, a 5-4-3 defence, or a double-wing formation—terms bandied about in the best football circles?

Toronto is the home of Canada's finest Intercollegiate team of 1958. Toronto must surely also be the core of women's football in the country.

"May they ever thrive—o . . ."

Interfac Football Semi-Finals On Trinity, Vic, Favored To Repeat

The Mulock Cup playoffs continue today with Victoria strong favorites to brush aside UC and become finalists for the third year in a row.

The other game between Trinity and Sr. Skule must be rated a tossup. Although a win by Skule would be ranked as an upset, it is not altogether out of the picture.

Trinity are unbeaten to date, but an already thin bench has been badly depleted by injuries to key men, and they may find the going tough in a close game.

Vic have the best depth of talent of any team in the league, but their offence is about as reliable as a Model T Ford, vintage 1909.

Their defence has won ball game after ball game though, and it should be plenty today. UC have a good team, but they don't possess the power or the depth needed to beat Vic.

Men to watch on the Vic offence are halfbacks Kenny Myers and Don Seebach, while the passing combination of quarterback Paul Sapuntjis and end Grant Bull is one of the most potent in intramural ball.

Playing coach Steve Moriarty and Bill Bell lead a good defence. UC on the other hand, have no outstanding players. All their wins, (and they were undefeated in Group II) came on a solid team effort, backed by a stout defence.

Game time is noon. Trinity are ripe for the picking, and Skule could give them a very unpleasant afternoon. Triple-threat quarterback Derek Lunn of SPS likes to throw to Nestor Snihura, and it is this combination that might be the pay-off for the Engineers.

They have a reasonable running attack and a very stout defence. Trinity will have their hands full beating them.

On the other hand, Trinity should not be sold short. They have a strong attack, both passing and running. A completed screen pass to Tony Boeckh among the secondaries usually means a touchdown.

Rusty Dunbar and Lynn McMurray give them running power inside and out. Quarterback Brook Ellis also has plenty of big ends to hit with his passes.

But the most outstanding facet of the Trinity team is their tackling. When moved to, they hit harder than anybody in the league. Peter Eby is foremost among the bonecrunchers.

Opening kickoff at 2 p.m.

It was most interesting to rummage in the waste basket yesterday, looking for a wandering piece of copy, and run across a few sections of newsprint—wired together under the flag "McGill Daily."

We paused for a moment over the head: "Canada To Be Bilingual Within Next 20 Years" and marvelled at the rapidity with which Quebec propagandists expect to perform their coup d'etat.

And then, over the page, came the sporting section.

Recorded therein was the startling information that:

● Brian Aston, Dick Rick, Al Dan, Gene Chorostiki and Larry Joyn had been selected to the offensive and defensive all-star teams.

● Varsity had placed thirteen and one-half players on the two teams.

● McGill had placed three and one-half.

● A gentleman called Thompson was a unanimous choice.

● McGill sportswriter Henry Mintzberg feels: "Aston played well, but may not have looked as good behind a weaker team."

● McGill sportswriter M. K. Woody feels: "Doug Baird of Toronto was a surprise, to us at least."

There were undoubtedly more pearls of wisdom, but a visitor to our fair den of felicity had judiciously wiped his feet on the page.

Leave us make comment on the above notations:

● According to a press release carefully prepared by our athletic office, we have the following players on the Varsity Blues: Brian Aston, Dick Rick, Bob Dan, Gene Chorosteki and Larry Joyn. To guess and mis-spell is forgivable; to read and mis-spell is not.

● We presume that Doug Baird, by virtue of being tied for a defensive end position, promptly became "one-half" a football player. Question: Which half would our McGill journalists consider to be more beneficial?

● Once again, we have "one-half" a player, and we must be serious for a moment. The player concerned is Redman halfback Wally Bulchak who, according to the McGill team doctor, "will never play football again." It's a tough break for a spirited and able performer.

● Who Mr. Thompson is rests beyond our comprehension. That's apparently the situation at the Daily, too, as they give neither his college nor his first name. The only Thompson in the league is Jocko at Queen's, and he was unanimous in that he didn't get a vote.

● Saying Aston may not have looked as good behind a weaker team is like calling Nikita a possible choice for next U.S. president. Brian ran the deadly option play to perfection a few times against McGill Redmen, and directed his team better—consistently—than any other quarterback in the league.

● If Doug Baird was a surprise to M. K. Woody, think what he was to punter Joe Irvin and passer Dick Carr, both of the McGill University football team.

While the McGill Daily Sports Writers Association is setting the sights of its guided missiles on our humble office, may we mention quickly that it is not our habit (nor do we condone the practice) to criticize our fellow fourth estaters.

But in a case where so many errors are presented to so many people, and we in Toronto are bearing the majority of the mistakes, it is necessary to defend ourselves.

Accuracy is a prime essential of the newspaper business. It's one of the principal reasons people read newspapers.

So may we mention, for what it's worth, that subscriptions to the McGill Daily may be obtained by writing c/o that paper, 690 Sherbrooke St. West, Montreal, P.Q.

Upstart Co-Ed Upsets Light-Hearted Debate

A University of Toronto co-ed last night threw the staid Hart House debates room into confusion when she insisted she be recognized by the chair during a Toronto-McMaster debate.

Second-year University College student Linda Silver, earlier warned by Speaker Ken Wyman she and another female were present "on suffrage only," told the house she would remain standing until recognized by the chair.

The house was debating "Now is the time," and the Toronto debaters came out on top nine to seven.

After standing for five minutes, Miss Silver told the house the speaker had been mistaken on a point of order.

Speaking for the motion, Pat Wooten (I Trin.) said "nothing has ever succeeded by doing nothing". He insisted we should take a definite stand in present day affairs. "Today, no man will act, and I ask you, where are we? We are being pursued slowly down the slipper road to Socialism," Wooten said.

Tom Elliott (II Arts, McMaster) opposed the motion, saying "If we say that now is the time, then that point has already passed." He described the motion as "absurd" and challenged the supporters to define what was the time, without looking at their watches. He described the stress placed on the present by the members for the ayes, as an order to disregard the lessons of history.

"I started in transmission work (many interesting challenges). With added experience I was made a Supervising Engineer, Circuit Layout, and I was asked to organize a new group to help speed the plan that is bringing modern city service to more and more suburban dwellers. "Later I was appointed a Supervising Engineer, Special Services (mobile telephones, community television, radio and TV programs). Recently, I have been involved in a modern automation method of data processing — one of the big new things associated with business communications.

Tuition Plan Rocks Campus Dunlop Supports Proposals

Students below second class standing have no place in Ontario universities, Education Minister Dunlop told The Varsity last night.

"It may be that these people are just as intelligent and just as capable as students who obtain higher standing, but their aptitudes lie in a different direction", he said.

"Institutes of technology such as Ryerson are relieving the universities of people who have a successful future and a useful career ahead of them in non-academic fields," he said.

Mr. Dunlop made the statement in commenting on the recommendations of President Bissell's advisory planning board, released Wednesday.

Most important features of the report were proposals to extend free tuition to all students of first class honor standing and the division of the vacation period into one month at Christmas, one month at Easter and two months during the summer.

The Education Minister said the proposals of the planning board's report "seem to me to be an excellent idea."

"Of course, it will require some financing, but that is suggested in the plan," he added.

Mr. Dunlop said he considered the change in the length of the school year a "very good idea."

When asked for comment on student criticism that the revised holiday schedule would seriously hamper them financially, the Education Minister said: "If they are to be so well assisted financially as the plan would indicate, the criticism is not valid."

"The whole plan is a very good idea put forward for further discussion," he continued.

The Education Minister said that if it is decided to implement the idea, it will be the university's decision.

Reaction: What Next?

PROPOSED PLAN for free tuition for first-class students, coupled with shorter summer vacation brings puzzled frowns to the comely faces of three University College cheerleaders.

Thirteen thousand university students took a good look at themselves yesterday.

And a lot of them began to sweat.

Reaction to the report of President Bissell's planning board's recommendations for sweeping changes in tuition and the academic year varied, but students were unanimous in deciding the shorter vacation period would impose definite hardships on non-scholarship students.

"We have to have practical experience in an office—and we want to hire a student for two months," said James Duncan (Arch.).

"One month holiday periods Christmas and Easter would be ridiculous," Jerry Smith (Dent) said. "You just can't have a job for a two-month summer vacation."

"You'll have to look for three jobs a year instead of one—that's exactly three times as hard," Hugh Johnston (II Vic) commented.

"The new system will make hard for students not in the first class honors group to have enough money for their tuition," Richard Chubb (IV SPS) added.

All students contended saw the provision of free tuition for first-class honors students was a good idea.

"I think it's a very good idea that students should get aid. It

Vote's Down On Gowns

At a calm and uncrowded special open meeting of the University College Literary and Athletic Society yesterday, the life of the gowns-for-UC issue drew quietly to a close.

Lit president Bill Davis, chairing the meeting, ruled, on the advice of Students' Administrative Council chairman Jerry Case, that a referendum which an open meeting last Tuesday voted to hold would not be in accordance with the Lit constitution.

The referendum was to be on the question of whether UC students should wear gowns. At the same meeting, a motion that students should wear gowns had already been thrown out by a much larger house.

"A referendum is unconstitutional," Davis said, "and there will not be one."

Case, serving as a constitutional authority to the Lit, said he had found nothing explicit in the constitution allowing a referendum.

"Constitutions grant powers," Case said. There must be something "positive" in the constitution for a referendum to be held.

The only possible "implicit" references, he said, were clauses referring to Roberts' Rules of Order and to Custom of Canadian House of Commons.

Roberts' makes no reference to a referendum, Case said. The Canadian House of Commons has never used one, although some provinces have and the Canadian government once called a plebiscite on the conscription issue.

Case said the idea of referendums is an "import" from the United States.

Mohammed Here?

The U of T's first official World University Scholar arrived here yesterday from the University of Cairo, Egypt.

Mohammed Ali Dokainish expected at the beginning of the school year, was delayed until yesterday by "trouble with transportation arrangements," Rick Shaefi, Engineering Society president who was with him most of the morning said last night.

Dokainish moved into Devonshire House, the U of T men's residence about noon yesterday after arriving at Malton airport around 11 a.m.

He had flown from Cairo to Montreal by Royal Dutch Airlines.

Dokainish registered at the school of graduate studies, where he plans to work for his Master's degree in mechanical design. He has his Bachelor of Science in Engineering from the U of Cairo.

He spent most of the afternoon trying to figure out his courses and later attended a reception in his honor at Devonshire House.

His studies here are being sponsored jointly by WUS and the Engineering Society.

Yugoslavia Trio Recall Journey

Three U of T students gave members of the campus Modern History Club a new insight into the mysteries of Tito-dominated Yugoslavia last night.

The trio, Tim Reid, Howie Mills and Mike Rasminsky, were delegates on a World University seminar last summer.

Tracing the history of Yugoslavia's break with the USSR, Rasminsky (IV UC) said Russia thought the Yugoslav leader would be overthrown by loyal party members.

But Tito "didn't wither on the vine...because Yugoslavians refused to spread their loyalty as far as Stalin," he said.

Showing slides of Yugoslavian countryside, Mills (II Emmanuel) said the government carefully retains some remnants of war damage as "effective propaganda to constantly remind people how good life under Tito is compared to former times."

Reid (IV Trin) read a report on the impressions of the 12 Canadian students taking part in the seminar. The report was originally presented before a group of Yugoslavian university students, he said.

The Canadians were unanimous in saying the position of the Yugoslavian student in society is much higher than his Canadian counterpart.

One student bitterly attacked the Yugoslavian student who, he said, had a dead mind and was incapable of effectively criticizing the government.

"The honesty, exuberance and sheer friendliness of the people captured the hearts of everyone," Reid said.

Time Running Out For Tri-U Concert Tickets

Only 250 tickets were left unsold last night for Saturday's Tri-University Concert.

They will be available today and tomorrow at the Hart House hall porter's desk, and cost $1.

Three choirs will participate in the program at 8:30 p.m. in the Hart House Great Hall Saturday night.

The Hart House Glee Club, the U of T Mixed Chorus, and the University of Rochester Women's Glee Club will sing separate numbers, and then combine in a 250-voice finale.

The glee club is still looking for a few beds for visiting U of Rochester women Saturday night. Information can be left at the hall porter's desk or the undergraduate office in Hart House.

A final release of the Glee Club Christmas carol record is on sale now at a reduced price.

The record is available at the Hart House hall porter's desk or the tuck shop for $3.50. Only 300 copies will be sold.

The record "has been one of our most successful ventures," publicity director Terry Jabour said last night. "But because we have a new director, we will withdraw it from circulation after this year," he said.

Pasternak Unpopular Merely run of the mill

MONTREAL (CUP) — A member of the Russian Embassy in Ottawa has referred to Nobel Prize-winning author Boris Pasternak as "merely a run-of-the-mill author."

R. Krasinikov, third secretary of the embassy, said Pasternak's works were not popular in Russia. It was illogical for Pasternak to win the award over many other Soviet writers, he said in a McGill University speech.

Pasternak's controversial "Dr. Zhivago" was rejected by Russian publishers and smuggled to a Communist publisher in Italy. The book won the Nobel prize this year, but author Pasternak rejected the prize after stiff opposition to the book was voiced in Russia.

Krasinikov said the author has never been regarded as an outstanding writer in his native country—but he is a "fair" poet and translator.

"Dr. Zhivago" was rejected on political grounds, he said. He had made "dangerous allegations" against the October revolution and the revolutionaries — something dear to every Russian.

Krasinikov said Soviet experts had examined the book and had demanded his expulsion from Russia. They had called the book "political nonsense and abuse on a par with murder and sexual propaganda".

The embassy dismissed as "nonsense" the claim that "Dr. Zhivago" is a "great book".

Commonwealth Is Source Of Strength

A professor of the Indian University of Allahabad, Wednesday said the changing pattern of the British Commonwealth has created a "ray of hope" amongst peoples.

Sponsored by the World University Service of Canada, Dr. O. P. Bhatnagar cited a great dichotomy between the Commonwealth and the "restrictive enterprise" of the Soviet Union.

Dr. Bhatnagar said countries like India and Pakistan were, till the end of World War One, a part of the British Empire; they were not the "dominions" that the Statute of Westminster provided.

But the basic ideals of the countries were similar to those of the Western dominions.

After numerous conferences during the '30s of this century, the idea of granting dominion status to these countries took hold. With the Declaration of Indian Independence, that country took her stand of equality with Britain and the other commonwealth countries.

Dr. Bhatnagar said in these times of economic rivalry, the Commonwealth of free nations is a "saving grace".

The Commonwealth offers an enormous contribution to the welfare of its community, he said.

Will Crown Vic Queen At 6T2's "Pogo Party"

Name of Vic's queen, picked by a secret panel of three male and two female judges, will be announced at 6T2's "Pogo Party" in Wymilwood tomorrow night.

"The judges will circulate mysteriously among the unsuspecting nominees, catching their true personalities at an unguarded moment", 6T2 President John Wood said last night.

"Nominations for the title have been literally pouring into the Vic Coffee Shop all week", he added.

"Last minute bids will be accepted until 10.30 p.m. Saturday night," he said.

THE VARSITY—a weekend review

Fifty Years Of French

By JOHN GRAY

Few men can look back on the span of their life and have no regrets. There are always ghosts of the past which loom up to haunt our failures.

Few students now at this university will be able to look back half a century hence and declare their lives happy, reaffirm their faith in their youthful goals.

But University College Principal F. C. A. Jeanneret has spent 51 years teaching the subject he loved in the college to which he has devoted his life. And he says he has no regrets at all.

When he arrived at University College back in 1908, the young Jeanneret studied modern languages, specializing in German, Italian, and French—all of which he spoke fluently.

Although he was of Swiss-French stock, it was not until his early teens that he developed his love of French—and still later that he discovered it was a living language in his own country.

"A 17-year-old youth, a Canadian 'jusqu'au bout des ongles' (to his fingertips) . . . a very humble and raw buck-private in His Majesty's militia, caught his first glimpse of 'le vieux Quebec' as he crossed the St. Lawrence on the ferry from Levis."

In the next few years he came in contact with the rabid nationalist groups of Quebec—Henri Bourassa, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and many others.

In the same period he joined the staff at UC, but continued his contacts with French Canada, until in 1926 he established a summer school for French teachers in Quebec City.

The sudden invasion of Ontario high school teachers raised the hackles of many of the inhabitants, but the school flourished.

ished until the war years, always under the guidance of its founder.

A constant champion of the teaching of French in this province, the Principal's stand has drawn him very close to French Canada. In Quebec he has long been recognized as one of the main leaders in the "one country, two languages" fight.

The other love of his life is his college. As registrar, department head, and for the last eight years Principal, he has seen UC through some trying times.

He is also the man responsible for the presence of the new Sir Daniel Wilson Residence. When he took over the job as Principal in 1951, it was with the firm purpose of having a residence built for UC.

In 1954 the job was completed at a cost of close to $2 million—more than $10,000 for each of the places in the residence, a record for Canadian universities.

In his office, Principal Jeanneret is charming to all visitors—"talking to students is the thing I have really enjoyed during my past eight years."

Students from all branches of the college have gone to him for advice, and they have come away with a picture of a happy man.

"There are great rewards in teaching. The student is just a cog in the machine until you meet him—then it is different."

And he says he has never had any regrets: "I wouldn't trade with anybody."

"I've made many mistakes, I've no illusions on that score—but the joys you get out of it are as great as any other if not greater."

With a twinkle seldom seen in academic men, he adds: "Not financial rewards, perhaps, but the others are well worth it."

It was possibly from Principal Jeanneret that U of T President Claude Bissell developed his firm stand on behalf of the humanities. He was once a student of his.

For many years UC French classes have been admonished: "No matter what happens in our world, language is one thing that can never be made automatic. There are too many subtleties for even science to grapple with."

Later in his academic career it was to Principal Jeanneret that the then Dean Bissell took a letter, inviting him to be president of Carleton College.

"I urged him to take it," explains the Principal nostalgically. "I expected to see him back here one day as president, even then. He will make a great contribution to the university."

It has often been said he is due for retirement in the near future, and this time it sounds as though the decision will be final.

If so, it will be into a library with the works of his favorite Moliere as his constant companion, as a happy man with no regrets.

Two Dollar Bill

First of four articles on the second McGill Conference on World Affairs which ended Saturday.

Where does Canada stand in relation to the United States? How much does the U.S. call the tune? These were the questions that were in the minds of the 70 Canadian and 25 American students who converged on the McGill campus last Wednesday for four days of conferences and discussions of the various aspects of Canadian-American relations.

Keynote speech delivered by Prof. Edgar McNinis, president of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, outlined the basic identity of the Canadian and American attitudes to both economic and international problems. The Yankee trader is a "hard-boiled sentimentalist" said McNinis, and while the American is generous if naive in the international field, he is a hard bargainer in the realm of trade. "Canada's acceptance of second-best solutions is the price we pay for harmony and protection, Canadian-American relations, he said, are a model showpiece for the world."

Chairman James Mallory described the Canadian position as the lingering liaison with the girl next door. In our youth we were eagerly available, but now that our dowry is of considerable value, we are playing coy and hard to get.

The political, economic and military aspects of the agenda came under intensive discussion at the small round table conferences, chaired by informed McGill professors and diplomatic experts from the Department of External Affairs. National views were exchanged frankly, points of friction discussed, and means of alleviating tensions explored. The complexity of the American political system was, it was felt, a major impediment to closer co-operation.

Congressman Frank Coffin received a standing ovation for his brilliant closing address. Emphasizing the danger of the Communist threat, he said "we are leading from strength", and must meet the challenge of "ruthless" economic tactics by increased integration on all levels of governmental activity.

The American delegates, anticipating a hostile reception, were surprised to find the Canadians calm and objective. A strong Canadian nationalism, the French language, and the two dollar bills were, they felt, the only real differences between us. Montreal's conducive night life proved most appropriate for furthering still closer Canadian-American relations.

McGill's sponsorship of this second World Affairs conference deserves the highest praise. Careful planning and thorough organization assured the conference complete success. Thanks to McGill's initiative, foresight and effort, each delegate returned home with a clearer and more balanced understanding of the complex problems confronting our sister countries.

Our Readers Write: Can Aid

Dear Sir:

Everyone who is intelligent knows that, like virtue, intelligence is its own reward. From this point of view, you would wonder what reasons, other than selfish, could promote these intelligent people to ask society at large for more, to ask for subsidies for their education beyond the high school level.

The old saw that attending university is some sort of sacrifice, that it is less pleasant than the world outside and therefore that it should be paid is blatantly false. Compare your school term with your summer job.

While it is true that society may derive some small benefit from the very few whose educations are placed at the disposal of their fellow men (and it should be noted that none of these services are performed free), anyone would admit that the greatest benefit of a university education goes to the person who gets it, and viciously his parents, who under the present system usually pay for it.

Of course, this overlooks the people who cannot afford to pay for their education, and this may include most students. These people should benefit from an extended and adequate loan system. It is a far better thing to begin a career owing a sum of money, than to risk the possible demands that society may someday make in return for its generosity.

BOB KAPLAN (I Jaw).

the World this Week

As weeks go, it was not an exciting one. In Toronto newspapers, international news was almost nowhere to be seen. An increasingly active civic election campaign, local disasters on a small scale, current and anticipated strikes, and Toronto's Royal Winter Fair claimed an unusual share of news pages.

Campaigning for civic offices in Toronto proceeded briskly with the major issues revolving around the proposed city hall and similar grandiose possibilities. Controller Joe Cornish, typical in his platform, came out in favor of a subway to Toronto Island.

Meanwhile, Toronto's first Jewish Mayor, mayor incumbent and candidate, Nathan Phillips, turned the other cheek in a hot three-way mayoralty fight, astounded everyone by praising his opponents. Shouted candidate Ford Brand: "What kind of a powder-puff campaign is this?"

In Sudbury, Ont., strikebound since Sept. 24 when 13,000 men walked out of International Nickel plants, men and their families started to go hungry despite relief and salvation army help. Winter was settling in.

Wednesday, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics revealed unemployment in the nation had risen last month to 313,000 up 42,000 over September, and 102,000 over the same month last year.

Internationally, a lightning putsch in Sudan resulted Tuesday in a new government headed by army boss Lt.-Gen. Ibrahim Abboud, without loss of life. The discreet rebels promptly pledged themselves to wipe out corruption while spokesman assured the world Lt.-Gen. Abboud was not in the Nasser-Arab Union block.

And in Berlin yesterday, 600 American military transport aircraft stood by to repeat the historic airlift into the Western zone of the city of 1948. If the Communists decide to once more force their desire for Western withdrawal from the city, the airlift will fly again.

For Ontario, and particularly for the province's university students, the earthquake of the week came with the report of U of T president Claude Bissell's advisory board on student aid.

Suggestions by the high-level academics that rocked the campuses of the province seemed to spell an end to the easy days of higher education. Free education for first-class students, help for second-class and nothing for the rest threatened, with a proposed lengthening of the academic year to cut out the stragglers.

Even more to the point in many minds was one question the whole issue raised: would Dr. Bissell's own pet plan to raise fees along with the other recommendations to utterly eliminate "incompleters" be in the works if the plan were ever implemented?

scrutiny

Three main topics of discussion have developed out of President Bissell's committee report on student aid. They are all valid issues for debate and, rather than detracting from the report, reflect the seriousness with which it is being considered.

The major objection from students centers on the proposed extension of the academic year and the reduction of the summer vacation to two months.

The second thing people are murmuring about is the sad fate of the third class honors student. The implications of the report, which mirror earlier statements by Dr. Bissell, are that third class students are not wanted at university. If they come, they pay their own way.

Thirdly we have, as we said yesterday, reservations about the report's tacit assumption that a student who rolls off the Ontario high school production line with twelve first class honors papers is in fact worthy university material.

Taking the last point first, it must be stated that there exist precious few other standards in the province to guide university selection committees. It would be impractical for universities to set up their own entrance examinations and even if they did, the techniques could not stray very far from the present matriculation system.

There remains, however, the legendary case of the mediocre scholar who struggles through the parched, artificial high school curriculum to bloom with brilliance when he reached the fresh, independent atmosphere of university.

Such students—and one shared in the discovery of insulin—would have very little incentive to come anywhere near university under the plan. Conversely, the high school student with the good memory and a sure knowledge of formulas but no very clear understanding of what they mean, will be escorted into university on a plush red carpet.

The second objection is an extension of the first. We believe a third class honors student has a right to come to university. If we exclude him by boosting fees to fantastic levels, as Dr. Bissell has suggested, or, if we exclude him by cutting his fee-earning summer employment period to two months, we are sacrificing his rights to the altar of academic expediency.

The third objection is on the face of it the weakest of the three. In the five months of summer vacation students earn on the average about $1,000. They are lucky if more than half of this ever reaches the coffers of the university bursar.

The report argues that the new student aid plan together with the increased effectiveness of the education program offsets the minor economic disadvantage to students of the two month summer vacation.

But this is valid only when first class students are being considered. Even second class students would suffer under the plan. In spite of the bursaries they will receive, there is still a large gap between what will be given and the cost of a year at university. The third class student, who receive no help, will be completely deprived of the chance to put themselves through university.

To sum up, the accent of the proposal is on intelligence and the ultimate aim seems to be to fashion the university into a true palace of pedagogy, an actual citadel to the mind.

The aim, except for its obvious effects on extra-curricular activities, is admirable. Excellent too is the incentive to achieve high academic standings and the general improvement in the means to do this provided by the plan.

But what does bear close examination are the methods by which we judge intelligence. The present system is mechanical and automatic enough. The future system could add the element of tragedy.

the Camera Eye Yugoslavia — VI

Freedom: only in sport

By HOWIE MILLS

I find I must take exception to a statement made by Tim Reid in his article—"Yugoslavia - IV", last week. In explaining the virtual lack of freedom of thought in the universities, where education has become an indoctrination in Marxist dialectics, Reid said that this state of affairs existed only in the humanities, not in the pure sciences or the cultural arts.

I cannot speak for the engineer or the physicist, but I do know that the artist does not have the complete freedom you might think. There are really only two small groups of people in Communist Yugoslavia who are, and can be independent and therefore free. These are the professional athletes and the professional musicians. Even more than in the West, these people are among the wealthiest—they are about the only ones in Yugoslavia who can live in private mansions, drive private cars, and, without breaking laws, generally disregard Communist restrictions.

However, there is quite a contrast in the fields of literature, painting, and sculpture. For artists in these fields, there is virtually no freedom of expression because all art is state subsidized. The people of the land cannot afford to buy such works of art, and thus the artist depends on the state buying his products and displaying them in museums. But this is where the fun comes; for unless you are producing within certain art-trends, you get no subsidy—therefore you starve.

The Yugoslav, of course, would never admit that this is the reason for the subsidy. He asserts that the state recognizes the cathartic value in art: socialist society requires the self-expression of the individual and art is a great means of expressing his true feelings. Therefore by providing material aid, the state is allowing the "positive" self-realization of the individual.

Yugoslav art-forms have been slow to develop, and have generally lagged behind European movements by at least fifty years. But in the last decade, under Communism, Yugoslavia has adopted its own distinctive trends, and is producing prodigiously.

Artists are, in practice, subsidized only if they produce within two accepted movements: the first is Socialist Realism, generally portraying brotherhood and the collective ideal in a 'photographic' way. This is quite distinct from the harsh, almost inhumane and didactic soviet socialist realism of Russia. The second artistic trend, is a Modernism, contemporary elsewhere in the world, but again, somehow supporting distinctive Yugoslav ideals. There is a strong antithesis between these two schools, with the older artists and the younger artists lined up against one another.

Yugoslavia's history is symbolized by the word "struggle" and her painting and sculpture remind the people of it. Even in much modern art, the struggling theme can be depicted as men vie with other men, with nature and with beasts, all with arms and legs intertwined and with agonized expressions.

The Communist state makes much of the press, and accordingly is listed by Unesco as the biggest per-capita publisher in the world. Much of the world's literature is translated and published in Yugoslavia, while some of her contemporary authors and poets are being read elsewhere, especially in France and Poland. Classical English literature is widely translated and read, but as with all things there are certain criteria for censorship. The same criteria apply to home and foreign writers.—First the literary standard must be good, and then the ideals supported in the work are considered—or so the Yugoslavs implied. You can be sure that in certain circumstances at least, the latter criterion is paramount. This is certainly the case of the heretic, Milovan Djilas, about whom Mike Rasminsky wrote a week ago. The whole world agrees that his autobiography has a terrible style, but they still publish it. The Yugoslavs openly admitted that his second book "The New Class", is considered heretical. Therefore the book was banned and only a "critique" of it was published in the newspapers.

All this is made possible because of state controlled boards which look after cultural affairs. All of the 25 publishing houses in the country are state owned and operated, and each has its own censor board. A writer may submit his work to as many publishers as he likes. It must be reviewed and evaluated by at least three critics, and if they agree the book is published. However, to assure control, each board includes two people, who are not necessarily government representatives, but are "public spirited individuals."

So you can see that in a Communist country, even one as liberal as Yugoslavia, there is no freedom as we know it, even in the arts.

Angry Young Mennonite

Presenting any play in Toronto, as the Playhouse recently found out, can be a dangerous proposition. To attempt a play by an unknown playwright with unknown actors and an unknown director is to court disaster. Last night at the Women's Union Theatre the U.C. Players Guild tried and to a gratifying extent succeeded.

The play, "The Tree by the Gate", by Dave Helwig (III UC) which will be done again to-night at 8.30, is the first part of the Guild's ambitious program to present original one-act plays by undergraduates.

It is hard to find an adequate basis for appraising a production in which almost everyone concerned is feeling his way toward professional standards.

However there is room both for some tentative praise and equally tentative criticism.

The play takes a young Mennonite boy through a period of crisis. He wants to be a painter. His widowed mother wants him to get a good job and settle down. Only the Girl Next Door attempts to understand his artistic ambitions. He is interviewed for a job and doesn't get it, but while he is gone his mother burns his paintings. Bitterly he breaks away and sets out for a larger world.

"The Tree by the Gate" was advertised as a play about the artists' relations with society. It is not that. As an artist he has no quarrel with society. There is no indication in the play of a conflict either with the Mennonite community or with a larger society. What he is in conflict with is the older generations whose horizons are not as broad as his own.

Because the play manages to say more about the mother-son relationship than it does about the position of the artist, making the boy Johnny an artist at all perhaps clouds the focus a bit. Had Johnny's dissatisfaction with his mother's standards been vaguer, the basic conflict might have stood out more clearly.

Also the moment at which Johnny leaves his mother would have been much more poignant, had it been suggested somewhere in the play that he had some love for her.

However, all these things are already latent in a basically well written play that provides many fine moments. The actors and the director, Al Wilson, tackle the play heroically. Most of them, especially Eva Poppleton as the girl friend, could do with a bit more passion, but David Humphreys as Johnny and Debbie Schwartz as his mother have some moving scenes together. Anne Dale and Don Crumney are fine in brief appearances. The direction tends to slowness and does not make sufficient use of stage movement but rises to meet the high points in the play. And an attractive set by Jim Spence and effective lighting by Bill Davis help to make "Tree by the Gate" more than good enough to justify the U.C. Players' Guild's policy.

Better Hollywood

Stanley Kramer's The Defiant Ones (Lowes) starts out as a rather good suspense melodrama, about an escape and pursuit of two Georgia prison convicts, and it is in the documentary vein that the film achieves its most exciting moments. These occur mostly at the beginning—scenes of a truck travelling at night, the men inside, an accident that makes possible a getaway. Another scene is a close-up of the two convicts are clutching their way from rock to rock across a flood-swollen river, the current becomes too strong and sweeps them away in a churning torrent half a mile downstream. This was visual impact of a high order.

As the film moves away from documentary to probe the personalities of its characters, it perhaps gains in emotional depth what it loses in momentum. The two convicts, Jackson (Tony Curtis) and Cullen (Sydney Poitier), are chained together, and their resentments against each other have to be subordinated if they are to agree even on which direction to run. Gradually this working agreement changes to more deeply felt friendship, and when Jackson has a chance to escape with a young backwoods woman (Cora Williams), he deserts her to save Cullen. Both Curtis and Poitier handle their roles persuasively. Tony Curtis, in fact, shows a surprising range of expression. But however sympathetic they are, there are times when one longs for the excitement of the opening scenes. This is especially true at one point, when Jackson confides to the girl his dreams and longings of a happier life, in a drawn-out bedside scene that seemed forced and artificial.

From this point on, there is an upward-turn toward action and movement, as the convicts race to the freight train that will take them to the north and freedom. They come very close to it, but, just as Huck and Jim had to end their journey down the Mississippi, so the escape of Jackson and Cullen is short-lived, an interlude, before they return to the prison they and society have made for themselves. Perhaps the film's most disturbing effect is that you feel they have earned the right to escape.

As he has done before, Kramer uses the camera and sound track with telling effect to describe the landscape through which the convicts and their pursuers are moving. The musical score is kept to a minimum, and with a folk song, "Long gone", sung by actor Poitier, establishes atmosphere very quickly. Oddly enough, he sings three times during the story, at the three times that he is a prisoner.

Puccini and Verdi Night

Gerard Hoffnung's famous spoof of the Italian tenor came to mind very often Wednesday night at the International Artists Concert in Massey Hall. Tenor Eugenio Fernandi, like Mr. Hoffnung's prototype, has four gears: fff, ppp, wobble, sob.

Replacing the suddenly indisposed Eleanor Steber, Frances Yeend, of the New York City Centre did not on such short notice rise to the occasion of a Puccini-Verdi celebration with Messrs. Fernandi, Susskind and the TSO.

Mr. Fernandi has the appearance, poise and delicacy of a very poorly trained football player. Much like the quarterback trotting on to the field he bounded on stage to the sounds of cheers and shouts. Ignoring the elegant theatrics of the soprano and conductor, he poured out an unabashed river of gold in lavish quantity and quality. I am sure that his rude appearance was skillfully affected since it fits very comfortably into the circenses element of Italian opera and was very well received by the assembled Italian colony.

Miss Yeend was at a clear disadvantage; a very short notice, a voluminous partner and a rather reserved voice for a dramatic soprano. Her one advantage was her experience in Turandot this summer at Verona, which made her rendition of the second-act aria "In questa reggia" her highlight in the concert.

To open this concert which celebrated the 150th anniversary of Casa Ricordi and the 100th birthday of Puccini, Mr. Susskind led the orchestra through a sensuous performance of the Manon Lesaut Intermezzo.

The soloists were first heard in the Act-I duet from Tosca which due to Miss Yeend's warming-up period and the orchestra's ponderous, unsteady accompaniment did not come close to dramatic intelligibility. The supposedly soaring joy at the intended Cavaradossi cottage in this scene (Non la sospiri la nostra cassetta) did not even get off the ground. And Fernandi's loud interjections and facial expressions reminded me of a real tured in volume and expression its awful sob; her high notes searing her lower register menacing.

Mr. Fernandi's first solo was a sensitive version of "Che gelida manina" from Boheme; he displayed a marvellous ability of singing pianissimo a loud, firm, if slightly nasal high register. One could only complain about the stereotyped quality of his sobs, besides their inordinate frequency. There is no dramatic justification whatsoever for passionately sobbing on the word "luna", after all, it only means "moon".

During the pauses for the artists and the audience, Mr. Susskind-conducted Puccini's Crisantemi (for strings) and Verdi's overture to La Forza; the latter being precise, forceful and lucid, the former, thickly played and thinly appreciated.

In the concluding portion of the Verdi section, Mr. Fernandi thrilled the audience with a lilting "Questa o quella" which found orchestra, conductor and soloist in top form and concordance. Miss Yeend was then heard in a relaxed and subdued "Pace, pace mio Dio!" from the last act of Forza. Then both were heard in the final duet from Aida; a moving and poignant rendition which proved to be the only satisfying collaboration between the two singers during the whole concert.

Although the Toronto Symphony Orchestra has not had much occasion to play opera, the accompaniment throughout was generally on a high level, showing the orchestra's potentialities which can be realized by more application.

estate agent rather than a would-be husband; but he produced beautiful sound, all that one can expect from opera-in-concert (this latter being almost a contradiction in terms).

In the second act of Turandot, the title heroine explains to Calaf her hatred of men and her princely suitors. The aria "In questa reggia" is a dramatic high point of the opera and is accomplished, in production, by eerie murmurings of the chorus. Miss Yeend, who has considerable experience in this role, cap-

Brilliant violinist, Betty-Jean Hagen, will appear in a recital at the Hart House Sunday evening concert at 8 p.m. Her programme will include Handel's Bransles, Bach and Bartok. Tickets from the hall porter.

"Our (the Ontario Government's) part in the operation is to test prospective students by means of the Grade 13 exams; from then on the university takes over.

Mr. Dunlop said his department intended to ask the Provincial Legislature for extra grants at its next sitting.

These grants will be used for scholarships to be awarded solely on high academic standing, he said.

will help raise our standards," Margaret MacDonald (III UC) said.

"I think the tax-payer will probably get nicked for it in the long run, as the universities certainly can't afford it," Bill Sayers, (SGS) said.

"Being a student is now an occupation rather than a past-time," he continued, as the basis for being kept here would be marks alone."

Doug Wilson (IV Meds), President of the Medical Society, said "I think this new plan would encourage a lot of people who now stay away from Medicine because of the long course and high fees to enter the Faculty."

Faculty members contacted also voiced approval of the proposals.

"It may well encourage able students who now shy away from long courses to enter them," Professor W. H. Watson, Head of the Physics Department, said.

"I like it in general," Father John Kelly, President of St. Michael's College said.

"However, certain things about it might raise problems," he continued.

Mrs. M. Q. Ianis, University College's Dean of Women said "It's a very interesting idea, and I'd certainly like to read more about it."

Political Series

Discuss Organization

Gordon Dryden, prominent Toronto lawyer, will address the Liberal Club at the Alpha Phi fraternity house Sunday at 8 p.m.

His speech on "Party Organization" is part of a "Political Thought Series" sponsored by campus Liberals.

"All members of the club will be able to attend two or three of these meetings during the year by rotation," publicity director Clair Lewis said last night.

Tom Sommerville, past president of the campus Liberal Club, was elected president of the Toronto and York Young Liberal Association on Tuesday.

Clair Lewis is the new association secretary.

Scores Method for Intellectual Inertia

Mike Rasminsky, (IV UC) scored "intellectual stagnation" in Yugoslavia Wednesday night before a packed meeting of the External Affairs Committee.

Rasminsky, one of three delegates to last summer's World University Seminar in Yugoslavia, described the state's method of relieving the individual of all responsibility for thought and education.

"Marxism is part of both primary and high-school education," Rasminsky said. "And after first year university there is an oral examination in Marxism."

"Apathy exists to a wide degree among Yugoslav students," he said, adding that criticism of Marxist doctrine rarely occurs.

"Neither democracy nor North American life concern Yugoslavians students, Rasminsky said. "They take an interest only in building their own country," he added.

He pointed out that Yugoslavians may be the only sincere Communists in existence since they are required only to be loyal to their homeland.

"Yugoslavia is a country that doesn't make sense," he said. "Her people dislike the Russians, respect Nasser as a 'neutral power' and believe religion will 'die a natural death in a few decades.'"

Rasminsky termed Yugoslavia a "liberal dictatorship" declaring there is no capitalist class in the country.

SPS, VIC QUALIFY FOR FINAL

Engineers Upset Panthers 14-13 Snihura Spark In Spirited Victory

By DAVE GRINER
Associate Sports Editor

Victoria will meet Senior Skule in the final for the Mulock Cup next Wednesday in Varsity Stadium.

Both teams qualified by defeating their opponents in yesterday's games. Vic blanked UC, 27-0, and the Engineers pulled the upset of the year when they edged Trinity Black Panthers, 14-13.

Skule showed great fight and spirit as they came from behind a six-point deficit at half-time to hand the unbeaten Red and Black their first loss of the year.

Hero of the win was Skule's fine half, Nestor Snihura. He set up one of his team's touchdowns and scored the other on a long run.

Trinity jumped into a quick 1-0 lead as they took the opening kickoff and marched to the SPS 17-yard line. Peter Beamish burst to the goal-line but fumbled as he crossed it and Skule recovered in the end zone to hold the loss to a single.

Trinity scored again when John Swinden got behind the Skule halfbacks and took a long pass from quarterback Brook Ellis to go over standing up. The convert was no good.

This lead seemed formidable entering the second quarter, particularly when the SPS quarterback Derek Lunn had to leave the game. Lunn had been a standout for the Engineers all year.

His understudy, Sam Clements, proved the man of the hour as he completed three straight passes to lead Skule to their first touchdown.

McGill Here In Water-polo

There will be an Intercollegiate water-polo game between the University of Toronto and McGill University on Saturday at 1 p.m. in the Hart House pool.

This is the first of a two-games total-goals series. The second game will be played at McGill.

McGill have won the series for the last four years. But this year it looks as if Varsity might turn the tables on them. Most of last year's team is back and the squad has looked good in practice.

The outstanding newcomer this year is Mike McLoughlin who has played for Hamilton Aquatics in the past. Aquatics are former Canadian champions.

First he hit Snihura with a long one and Snihura nearly went all the way but stumbled when in the clear. Another pass took play to the Trinity five, and then he hit Marino Basadur in the end zone for the score. Snihura converted and the score was 7-7.

Trinity regained the lead on the last play of the half. Ellis passed to Tony Boeckh, who made a beautiful 18-yard run down the sidelines for the TD. The convert was no good, and that left the score at 13-7 in Trinity's favor at the half.

Snihura completed the scoring on the second play of the third quarter. He charged 71 yards off-tackle behind some devastating blocking and converted the touch to give his team a slim one-point margin that held up to the finish.

Try as they would, Trinity just couldn't get within range to kick the tying single from there on in. A stout Skule defence foiled their every move.

Trinity lost the game because they were clearly out-blocked and out-tackled throughout by a fired-up band of Skulemen.

Eby, Boeckh, and Dunbar all turned in fine efforts for the losers.

The Vic win came in more convincing fashion, but not until UC had given them much food for thought.

Held to a 2-0 lead at the half by the eager-tackling UC team, Vic burst out with three touchdowns in the final stanza to wrap up the contest.

Duane Wills kicked a pair of singles to account for the first half's only scoring, and then Mike Smith clinched the ball game on the first play of the second half when he roared 67 yards for a touchdown.

In the last quarter, Vic completely submerged the hard-fighting UC team with scores by playing coach Steve Moriarty, Grant Bull, and another one from Smith on a fine run from 20 yards out.

Once again the tough Vic defence held the opposition in check until the sputtering offence could move into high gear. Smith and Seebach were stand-outs with their running for the Viemen, who found the going considerably tougher than they had expected.

UC's good showing (and it was good, despite the score), came primarily off a team effort, but Jim Trenton, for his terrific tackling on defence, and Prit Pirso, who badly outkicked his Vic opposite number, deserve special mention.

Time is precious, suggested the waiter as he advised there would be only one more draught before the curfew.

Time is, indeed, precious (as is something else, recently) agreed the sports editor as he regarded his Bulova, gathered his wits, and plunged into a great pile of news copy eliminated by coverage of the Mulock Cup semi-finals.

To avoid my lynching by the hockey team, drowning by the swimming team, strangling by the harrier team, and poisoning by the soccer team, the usual Friday nonsense has been shelved to make way for items of interest to athletic fans.

In alphabetical order:

HARRIER

The note says Toronto ended its season by "almost white-washing" University of Niagara, 20-35. No kidding, that's what it says. I perceive our correspondent has been reading certain afternoon papers, where exaggerations are common (e.g. Fuds overcome huge deficit to smash Duds, 2-1).

Jans Roos, Dick Hamilton, Michael Berger, Hugh Gordon and Dean Hodgkins finished 2, 3, 4 and 5, kindly letting Niagara's Ron Plassey cross the line ahead of them.

Mr. Berger, by virtue of finishing fourth, was elected president of the harrier club. Which doesn't seem logical, but neither does the scoring system. (Sorry, Mike—we'll have to get the low-down on this sport sometime).

HOCKEY

Associate sports editor Gene Glsky (singing tunes from Glig!), directs me to inscribe words on his favorite topic of drum-beating these days—the hockey Blues.

Tonight at 8 o'clock in Varsity Arena, says GG, Jack Kennedy's icers entertain Brampton Lyndhursts (also sponsored by Greg Currie, who loves underwriting hockey gamers) in their last exhibition tilt before opening league play next weekend.

Blues, defending college champs, are rated by their jolly mentor to be a safer bet for the Laurel (now, now, Brooksie, don't wander) Wreath than his past four gold-grabbers.

There's no charge tonight (last free one of the year, misers) so hop down to the Bloor Street refrigerator for some dandy entertainment.

SOCCER

Our soccer Blues is going international. Yes, they is. On Sunday afternoon, they play University of Michigan (Ann Arbor) Wolverines in their first taste of international competition in five years.

All players will make the trip except Brian Michez and Jimmy Duncan; and halfback Paul Avis, our fine basion officer with the round-ball boys, promises a "ruddy good show, old boy."

Turn that statement into a win, Paul n'boy, because it appears our Packers from Kelowna have encountered some smackers from Moscow. Canada's reputation, you know . . .

SWIMMING

Get your fedora out of that glass of milk. Yorzyk, 'cause your aquamen are finally getting some free publicity (if you can call it either free, or publicity).

Etobicoke Memorial Aquatic Club (henceforth known as EMAC) are splashing in the Hart House pool tonight, with our defending champion Blues providing stellar opposition.

"It should be a very interesting meet," suggested Coach Yorzyk. Hope you're right, Willyum, and I hope everyone who reads this splits a la ameba and puts one lung in the Hart House swimming gallery, and the other in Varsity Arena.

ACE IN ACTION—Skule's Nestor Snihura (22) grabs a pass from quarterback Sam Clements to set up Engineers' first major in their surprise 14-13 win over Trinity yesterday. Sherbrooke-Bishop's Carnival Plan Will Aid French-English Relations SHERBROOKE, Nov. 20 — Plans for Canada's first joint university winter carnival were announced here recently by student councils of Sherbrooke and Bishop's Universities.

Apply Soon

Arts students have only ten days left in which to apply for their annual examinations.

Applications for the annual or-deals must be filed with College Registrars before the end of the month.

After that, the painful task becomes even more painful. Students who apply late will be required to pay a late fee of one dollar.

Application forms may be picked up in the offices of College Registrars.

Slated for early February on the Sherbrooke campus, the three-day event is designed to improve relations between the English and French-speaking student bodies and the local population.

"This is one of the best opportunities we have of establishing good relations with the French-speaking people, especially the students of Sherbrooke," commented Jacques Courtemanche, carnival committee chairman and Bishop's student.

Ronald Marcoux, instigator of Sherbrooke's bid to hold its first winter carnival, said it was a chance to organize something important both for students and Sherbrooke residents.

Highlighting the program will be a large-scale ice show in the Sherbrooke Arena, a winter sports day and a formal Carnival Ball.

Separate carnival queens will be crowned to climax the ice-show and plans are being made to present the traditional hockey game between the rival university teams for the Skinner-Nadeau Trophy.

Bishop's Students' President Ray Jensen said he is very happy with the decision.

"Co-operation on a social level is the most effective way of bringing the two student bodies together in a spirit of friendship," Jensen said. "This move represents a definite step in the right direction," he said.

University administrators were solidly behind the plan.

SMC Gryphon-like it rises

Resurrect Writers' Clique New Hope For Magazine

The St. Michael's College Writers' Group is rising phoenix-like from its esoteric ashes — and the group hopes they can make the St. Mike's Literary magazine, The Gryphon, perform the same feat.

The Gryphon, which is usually put out twice a year, will not appear this term for want of an editor, SMC Students' Administrative Council president Mike McCabe said last night.

Gryphon editors are usually drawn from the ranks of the Writers' Group.

However, last year's group was composed mostly of senior students, who graduated at the end of last year and this year the Group was temporarily extinct.

M McCabe said last night a three-week advertising and button-holing campaign at the end of last year produced only one candidate who was at all interested in the editorship—and she got married over the summer and lost interest.

A two-week advertising campaign at the beginning of this year also proved fruitless — the Writers' Group being defunct.

But about three weeks ago the group was revived at the initiative of Rev. B. Hennessey with third-year student Joan Bulger as chairman.

Miss Bulger last night said the group hopes to bring back the Gryphon for the Easter term if they can get support.

She would be willing to edit the magazine, she said, if she was confident she could get enough material.

The newly-reformed group has yet to approach the SMC SAC, she said. "We've been waiting to do anything at all until we've found out if we've got support."

M McCabe last night said SAC funds are available which could be allotted to the Gryphon if an editor were found.

Last year's Group, Miss Bulger said, was composed "almost entirely of very intelligent, very intellectual fourth-year students."

"This year's group, she said, is 'mainly people who haven't come before.'"

Writers' group member Dave Brison (II SMC) last night said

this year's group is producing "none of this obscure, highly-intellectual-type writing — like, you know man—none of this sort of Eliot-type writing." Brison denied being a member of the Group of Five.

But Miss Bulger said if anybody wrote the "Eliot-type stuff" — which she approves of but doesn't produce — she would be glad to hear it.

There has been only one meeting of the group so far, she said, and she hasn't heard any of the more obscure type of writing.

Following Group meetings, she said, will show whether the group will be able to provide enough support to publish a Gryphon.

"We're just hoping," she said.

Although the Gryphon usually appears twice yearly, McCabe said, this would mark the second year in a row it has not. Last year's editors only produced one issue because of a lack of material.

The Freshie

The Victoria College queen chosen Saturday night at the 612's "Fogo Party" is Jane Farrough.

She was crowned as "the true vic trestle" by a secret panel of judges who circulated among the nominees, in order to "catch the true personalities of the girls."

Happy Now

—VSP Cals.

SLEEPY but happy, little Anna Sissons ends her long telephone vigil and takes a well-earned nap. Her search for the students to whom she owed $5 ended with a reward for her honesty—they told her to keep the money.

Anna Happy, Money Hers

Little Anna Sissons ended her telephone vigil Thursday night with five conscience-free dollars in her purse. She was deluged with calls last week from people who claimed she owed them the money.

But when the right person called, Anna recognized him. "Most people wanted the money, but this person told me I could keep it because I was so honest," she said. "Besides he called twice."

Anna is a 14-year-old Toronto high school student who was left holding $5 at the Santa Claus parade Nov. 15 after she had helped five university students sell balloons. They offered her a 10 cent commission for every balloon she sold.

The names of the men involved are still in doubt, but Anna is sure they are U of T students.

"I'm pretty certain two of them are named Herbie and Marty, and that they are star basketball players," Anna said.

The two men apologized to Anna for the trouble they had caused her, and said they wouldn't bother her again "for another two or three years".

Anna has given part of the money to charity, and said she plans to use the rest of it for Christmas shopping.

Anna had told the students Saturday her name was Jane, because her mother had told her never to give her name to strangers. She promised to meet the men at an appointed place after the parade.

She waited an hour for them, in heavy rain, and finally went home. But she kept worrying about the $5 she had that wasn't hers.

AVR Out Of Danger, Cast Almost Complete

The All-Varsity Revue is off the danger list — but it still needs cast.

Almost 50 hopefuls flooded Howard Ferguson Hall Tuesday for the last night of AVR auditions. Three previous nights of try-outs had roused a total of 35 students.

Four dancers are still needed for the male kick-line, producer Bill Lord said last night. An otherwise complete cast list will be released tomorrow, he said.

Additional auditions for male dancers will be arranged shortly, he said.

Those chosen so far are "terrific—of an extremely high calibre", Lord said. "One thing pleasing us very much is that the cast is spread all over campus — no one college or faculty dominates the show."

Officials had to turn down a number of off-campus auditioners, Lord said. A few non-university dancers were accepted to fill holes in the girls' kickline, but all speaking parts will be filled by students, he said.

"We had to choose off-Campus talent because there just aren't enough good dancers on campus", he said.

Rehearsals for the two-act comedy will begin early in December. A special black-tie, limited-ticket opening night has been arranged for Feb. 9 in Hart House theatre. The original musical comedy will run for six days.

Officials have still not decided on an invitation to appear in the McGill Winter Carnival Feb. 21. The show is a "whimsical" comedy concerning the trials and tribulations of Emperor Nero as he seeks a cultural solution to the problem of putting down attempted sedition on the part of plotting Senators.

A love interest adds to Nero's problems. The show is set in 58 A.D.

Poetry Deadline...

Contributions for the University College Gargoyles' special poetry edition will be accepted until 5 p.m. tonight in The Gargoyle office, editor John Robert Colombo said last night.

The deadline has been extended to give those who may not have heard about the edition an extra chance, he said.

The 32-page magazine will measure 5½ by 4½ inches and will be released Dec. 15.

Wins Scholarship

An army officer, now studying at the U of T, has been awarded the Royal Canadian Engineers Memorial Scholarship for 1958.

Douglas D. Brown, a Royal Military College graduate, now taking engineering here, received the award at a ceremony at the Fort York Armoury Saturday.

The scholarship fund of $35,000 was raised by donations from the ranks of the RCE in memory of those of the corps who died in the Second World War. Ninety-six scholarships have been awarded since 1949.

Purpose of the fund is to assist outstanding students of Engineering, Architecture, or Applied Science at Canadian Universities who are members of the Canadian Officers' Training Corps, Regular Officers' Training Plan, or other corps, but preferably sons of present or former members of RCE.

Campus Conservatives Hear Party Brass, Create Platform at Caledon

About 50 campus Progressive Conservatives this weekend drew up a platform, heard informal talks from a number of people in the higher echelons of the PC party and enjoyed the facilities of the U of T's Caledon Hills Farm.

The campus PC platform, to be used in the elections for the upcoming Parliament, will be released later this week.

Guests at the Caledon jaunt included George Hogan, Toronto Young Progressive Conservative president and Prof. A. W. Baker, formerly of the Ontario College of Agriculture and, campus PC leader Gordon Ross said last night, largely responsible for the Diefenbaker farm policy.

The weekend also played host to federal parliament members Margaret Aitken and Dave Walker and the Hon. M. D. Diamond, Ontario Transport Minister.

Mr. Walker (MP, Rosedale) defended the Diefenbaker government's stand on the proposed Canadian Bill of Rights.

Once the statute is on the books, Mr. Walker said, no party will dare revoke it as the bill will have too much authority in the minds of the Canadian people.

Mr. Walker, campus PC spokesman Max Rotstein said last night, founded the campus PC's and is considered its "spokesman and guardian angel."

Mr. Hogan, Toronto YPC head gave the Conservatives a short history of the Canadian Conservative party.

Prof. Baker said the Diefenbaker government's farm policy is the first farm policy worthy of the name the country has seen.

Miss Aitken chatted with the members Sunday afternoon about the duties of private members of parliament.

An "informal bull-session type of atmosphere was maintained at all times," Rotstein said last night.

The weekend concluded with a dinner Sunday night at which Mr. Diamond spoke on the proposed demerit system for penalizing drivers in Ontario and the Ontario health plan.

Says 3 Revolts Gripping Church

U of T's Anglican chaplain last night said today's Christian Church is currently in the grip of "three basic revolutions."

Speaking in an informal meeting of the newly-formed University Forum of St. Clement's Church, Rev. William Bothwell said the first is a "revival of biblical theology."

This is a trend towards considering the common vision of the biblical teachings, rather than looking for discrepancies in the accounts, he said.

The Liturgical Movement, or a reunderstanding of the meaning of worship is the second, he said. For form of worship, the Anglican Book of Common Prayer was becoming the norm, and even in the Roman Church there is evidence of a gradual change.

The third and greatest revolution is the Ecumenical Movement for unity in the Christian church.

Father Bothwell concluded by recommending a study of these movements to today's church, to anyone who felt that the Church was static and becoming irrelevant in our rapidly-changing society.

A Lawyer-Poet Talks About Politics

By JOHN ROBERT COLUMBO

He had steel-gray eyes and was wearing a steel-gray suit. This seemed to fit his personality, as did his height, which was well over six feet. He looked more like a retired colonel than a Canadian poet.

This was my first impression of F. R. Scott. I saw him for the first time Friday evening. He was sitting in Abe Isaacs' Greenwich Art Gallery, under some bright lights and surrounded by great blobs of impressionistic colour.

The lanky, 59-year-old author of three books of genuine Canadian verse looked like a self-assured New England insurance man when I moved closer. He was rifling through some of his books in preparation for this year's first Contact Press Poetry Reading.

I ambled up and introduced myself with a question. "What exactly is your legal standing," I asked. In precise sentence Scott explained he was a lawyer and a teacher. "Since 1928 I have been the Macdonald Professor of Constitutional Law at McGill." He mentioned that he had been born in Quebec, the son of a poet, that he was a Rhodes scholar and the recipient of a Guggenheim Fellowship.

"I still practice law occasionally," Scott added, "but only civil liberties cases. I recently had the Padlock Act Case declared unconstitutional. I'm now waiting judgment on another, the Roncarelli Jehovah's Witnesses case in Quebec."

Scott, I knew, was well known for his political views which are inclined to be radical; they appear in his poetry as well as in his political studies. A staunch supporter of the CCF party, he has even written two books with David Lewis. Scott is no ivory tower poet.

Having had enough of politics, I asked him about Canadian writing. "Canada is a country of such great size," he explained, "that it forces writers and poets into regional groups. Poetry readings such as these may help to overcome this literary regionalism somewhat."

Scott stood up to greet an old friend. "Why, Big Carter!" he said. "How are you," Big Carter looked like a successful insurance man with many reminiscences, so I worked my way back and found a seat. The Gallery was rapidly filling with a curious collection of people and seats were hard to come by.

The reading went well. Scott reads competently and his poems are readily intelligible. They are that kind of poetry. Then there was a question period, after which the crowd rapidly dispersed. Ray Souster, poet laureate of Toronto, starting folding up the chairs to clear the Gallery for Saturday's business. Everyone who stayed to help was invited to a party afterwards in Scott's honor at an Eglinton Ave. apartment.

varied evening with F. R. Scott

Once there, the Montreal poet turned out to be an excellent mixer. He smoked a pipe and drank well. Since he preferred discussing politics to metrics, the soiree broke up into small groups centering around less socially-conscious poets. Drifting from one group to another, one could hear Scott holding his own on the incompetence of the Indian Affairs Department, Burmese nationalism and the "state of siege" of French-Canadian writers.

I finally cornered him for a few moments and asked him if he were related to F. G. Scott, the Archbishop-Poet of Montreal. "I was the fifth of his six children," he replied, "and I can still remember we had to line up to hear him recite his newest poems. I still think about this."

I asked him what he thought of the works of Jay Macpherson who was just now out of earshot. "She has added something new to Canadian writing," he said. "She's enlarged our possibilities. There is a maturity of thought and expression in her work."

Approaching the problem of the myth, I asked him if he had read "The Anatomy of Criticism". His reply was interesting. "Not all of it... I don't read much about poetry. It is only one of my interests. That is perhaps the trouble with many writers and poets today. They are primarily something else. What we need in Canada is more professional writers..."

We were joined by our exuberant hostess, an amateur translator, and she and Mr. Scott went on to compare the virtues of Garneau with those of Pilon; by 12.30 a.m. it was Trotter's views on poetry and, by 1.00, translation as an art.

By 1.30 I overheard Mr. Scott on the St. Lawrence Seaway and, at 1.45, on a small tribe of cliquish Indians. By 2.00 a.m. everyone decided it was time to go home to bed.

The group drifted into the hall of the apartment building but the group was so noisy that the hostess was forced to put her finger to her lips. No one heeded. Ray Souster's voice carried over the rest: "Be quiet! Everyone's in bed on Friday nights in Toronto!"

Stepping into the elevator I recalled Mr. Scott's lines describing a similar situation thirty-one years earlier:

O Canada, O Canada, Oh can
A day go by without new authors springing

To plant the native maple, and to plan

More ways to set the selfsame welkin ringing,

Then I congratulated him on his reading and on the truth of his poetry, all the while silently wondering about this tall lawyer-poet who preferred to contribute to Canadian culture rather than to gossip about it.

Your 1959 Torontonensis

The Most For The Least

To the 53 hard-working undergrads who are busily engaged in producing the 1959 edition of Torontonensis, truer words could not be spoken.

We say "the most" because Torontonensis, with its 450 pages, leads all Canadian yearbooks in size, and is larger than most of those in the United States. McGill's has only 404 pages, while University of British Columbia's Totem has 416 pages. Not to be outdone in any other respect, we also claim the most variety of content in our yearbook. Up until 1950 Torontonensis was known primarily as a yearbook for graduates, and contained pictures and write-ups of activities which were of interest only to them. In the past eight years more and more lower year activities have been included. 'Nensis contains something of interest for each student — complete coverage of his year's activities, be it sports, college shows, fraternities or one of the various campus clubs. The impressive Graduate Section, with its biographies and pictures of each graduating student, completes the book.

We say "the least" because Torontonensis sells for the incredibly low price of less than a cent a page. A few years ago 'Nensis sold for $5, the present price of McGill's yearbook. But this week 'Nensis can be purchased at the reduced price of $4; after Friday the price increases to $4.50.

Total cost of producing the book is about $11,000, most of which goes to printing and engraving costs.

Booths and displays will be set up this week in most colleges and faculties. If you want a permanent record of your year at U of T; if you want to see pictures of yourself, your friends and pseudo-friends; if you want tangible proof for the family that you didn't spend all your money socializing; if, in future, you want to reminisce with your grandchildren about your days at Varsity; then order your copy of Torontonensis by leaving your four dollars at one of the booths this week.

P.S. And if you want your own signature printed in 'Nensis, bring your sales receipt to the office (basement of the Students' Administrative Council building) this Friday. This receipt will entitle you to sign a special "autograph sheet" which will be printed in the yearbook.

Blonde, blue-eyed...

The Editor

For the second time in its 61-year history, Torontonensis has a woman editor.

A lively blonde with blue eyes, Sandra Whittall is a third year student of French and German at University College. Since high school, she has taken an active interest in the field of publications. At Bathurst Heights she worked on The Student Prints, and in her last year at Downsview Collegiate was co-editor of the yearbook. Opus I, and editor of High, a monthly magazine for Ontario high school students. In her first year at university she stepped into the position of activities section editor on the Nensis staff, and moved up to the editorial board of High.

Asked why she became editor of the '59 Nensis, Sandra exclaimed she was so flattered to be considered for the position that she didn't know how to refuse the offer. In a more serious vein, she went on to say that she considers the compiling of a permanent record of the year's activities an important task of the utmost interest to all the students on campus. Most people do not have time to make a scrapbook of university activities, she pointed out, but Torontonensis is a ready-made scrapbook in a universal sense not only does it record personal activities, but it includes campus coverage of athletic, academic, and social organizations of the university.

Her job?—Sandra chooses and trains her staff, collaborates with section editors, photographers, the engraver, and the printer, and makes decisions concerning policy. Her aim for Torontonensis this year?—to present a "lively, artistic, and meaningful record of the university year" said Sandra. Nensis '59 will feature bright colour, more refreshing art work, and some academic coverage as well.

Besides year-booking, Sandy manages to find time for basketball and swimming, and is an active member of the V.C.F. After completing her course in Modern Languages and Literatures, she plans to enter the teaching profession, where she can devote some of her talents at least to high school publications.

To Each His Own

There's been a lot of commotion about the new social register appearing in Canada for the first time. Do you know that we've had a social register on the U of T campus for years? The Torontonensis—what else? Have you ever felt that you too are one of the campus elite but lack adequate recognition? Have you been hiding your light under a bushel basket? Here's what the Nensis can do for you...

To get your name into the Canadian social register, you have to have contributed in some visible way to the intellectual, artistic, scientific, cultural growth of this our nation. But don't be discouraged! The Nensis wants you for your lovely self. Just look at the past issues. Rank upon rank of football players, ballet-dancers, campus politicians, party-goers, and — "They also serve who only stand and wait".

This Blue and white Book has another similarity to the "Blue Book" we've been hesitating to mention, but, since you've read this far, you must be keen. It's money. There's a nominal fee for the privilege of showing your picture to your friends (mind you, they're in it too). In other words, you have to buy the book.

Here's an added bonus. If you happen to be graduating, you get your picture in gratis, your name in big bold letters, and a personal biography, no less.

Well, maybe these aspects of the book don't appeal to you. For you we have something too. The Torontonensis, in all its 450 pages, makes a good door-stop or paper-weight, swells your book-case admirably, and is great for weiner roasts. Seriously, the magazine presents an excellent record of your college year. You may not be sentimental now, but who knows about the years to come.

The fall campaign to sell Torontonensis in full swing. Students have until Friday to order their copy at the reduced price of $4.00. Next week the price jumps to $4.50. Look for the sales booth in your college.

Writing was done by Ina Jane Healey, Nan Keeling, Marilyn Powell, Joan Powers, and Carole Levine.

Four bucks for a Torontonensis or whatever it is—are you kidding? So what if there are four hundred and fifty-six pages?

Just a minute, isn't that a picture of that frat party we were at? You remember, the time Al got the cat sloshed. And look, there's Charlie, that old son-of-a-gun, how did he get his picture in here? ... No, no, I don't want to buy a Torontoteensis. I'm just leafing through these first few pages. Hold it, there's Carole, the blonde you had at the house party. I don't give a damn about the lovely binding. What a doll! Geez there's that crazy float we had for the homecoming parade. Real bash wasn't it? ... Yeh, it's not bad but not four bills worth of my hard earned dough. O.K. I'll just be a second longer. I... Girls' hockey, what a laugh! Hey there's last year's squash team. Ours should be in this year's edition, eh? Whadda you know, I'll be in the yearbook. What? Early-sales discount too? Well maybe. Yeh I guess you'd better put my name down; I'll dig up the cash somewhere.

a gas, man

Well man, I guess we've hit rock bottom. You know what I mean man, like bottom. The end. No more. Solid, man, solid hard bottom.

Y'uh know?

I mean like in the old days, the real old days, there used to be clichés man, you know, like phrases everybody used. You get the idea I mean these clichés carried weight. They meant something. You could express yourself. You know, things you wanted to say, really say, would sort of come across. You didn't have to, well, to elaborate. I mean now things have to be explained. Clarified.

Well, now man, everybody talks refined like. They say things, I mean like express themselves for effect. You know, like as if they were afraid of using common everyday speech. They don't use clichés anymore. They're sort of, well scared, I guess.

Clichés just don't sort of, well, don't sort of jell anymore like. I mean like its awful. Everybody has to be so damn original. They don't just talk, like they compose. We've lost something, man, something that was clear and good. I mean like, good.

Well, you know man, like now we have to articulate, get some color.

It's a shame man, like I mean it hurts. The english language has gone poetical like.

I guess we'll just have to dree our weary weards.

A Third-Class Student Speaks

By MARK NICHOLS

This is a defence of the third-class student.

The report of President Bissell's advisory committee on student aid has thrown a powerful bomb into the complacent ranks of the third-class student in Ontario Universities.

It is an exciting plan, it has rightly stirred up a barrage of comment and stimulated a good deal of thought.

By providing free education for the best, plenty of help for the second best, by cutting the vacation periods into irregular chunks, the plan would make it close to impossible for the third-class student to swing a university career.

More frightening is the possibility that Dr. Bissell's own idea to triple fees might be added to the present proposal. Then the third-class, or as Dr. Bissell has termed him, "incompetent," student would be finally eliminated. We seriously wonder if his race is worthy of extinction.

The question raised, then, is this: who is the third-class student, what is he, and what use is he to society?

Other features of the plan, however, require examination first. The report notes the need for a special staff to administer the vast scholarship program suggested. Means tests would be created to decide who is needy and who isn't.

It is estimated that it would cost the University of Toronto alone some $1,500,000 to support the plan one year with fees remaining at their present level.

But where is the tremendous lump of money needed going to spring from?—very likely from industry.

A certain picture emerges, not a pleasant one: an intellectual elite, paying for education by a mechanical academic performance that started with excellence in Grade 13, a growing bureaucracy, sifting the personal life of the student, guiding him along the way, increasing direction of the academic picture from the top—from government, from industry.

The tune the piper plays at university could be more controlled by the man of business or government who holds the purse strings or acts at the behest of public opinion.

Industry we have seen in the United States, can easily provide a good deal towards higher education. It is clear that threatened with a lack of engineers, biochemists, mathematicians, draftsmen, lawyers, and technicians of all kinds, industry will be willing to supply the funds for free university training.

And, no doubt, while paying for the training of material it needs, industry could see fit to subsidize the arts education the university will insist upon.

But the arts student will become more and more a luxury whose existence is precarious.

Recently Dr. Murray Ross suggested that society has lost its "hungry fighters." He is, probably right. Life is very easy these days. Perhaps it is to easy here, in the university. A little toughening up would not hurt.

But the plan of Dr. Bissell's advisory committee is frightening. All too evident is a dark vision of a monster university, the machine, the grist mill, assembly line we have been warned of. Evident is a growing bureaucracy, a top-heavy university, the student isolated from the society in which he will operate, a hard narrowing of the freedom necessary to real learning.

Already, in North York, two bodies working on separate lines, are shaping the germ of a new university. But maybe York University and other new universities are not the right alternative to the board's recommendation.

We could not, it is argued, go on creating new universities forever. But more universities, combined with a toughening of standards that would not be crippling to initiative, seems more attractive than the thing the committee would create.

our readers write:

From The Group Of One

Dear Sir:

This letter has been occasioned by your very excellent but exceedingly mistaken editorial entitled "Intellectual Rabble". I have been at this university for some time now, and have read many a rabble-rousing article and editorial in The Varsity. And until now, I have never felt the need to comment on any article printed within those hallowed pages. But now I think it is time to enter the conflict.

Let me say at the beginning that there is much in your editorial with which I agree. Indeed, the criticism of cliques which you give is a valid one, and may indeed be applied to the very clique to which you yourself, as a member of The Varsity belong.

However, let me gently but firmly state that on at least three counts your basic ideals may be criticised.

First, there is implicit in your term "gnawing loneliness" a judgment that such a state is bad. Is it?

Second, your criticism of the "Group of Five" may be biased. No doubt it is. I myself do not know, indeed have never heard of this group. Nevertheless, I would say—let them be! The fact that they attend "arty" films and discuss "erotic and illicit literature" may, to your mind, be an abominable and utterly loathsome way of living this one life we have to live. But my dear sir, is your manner of living life so much better that you can now condemn another's? Are you, indeed, so sure that the perversions which you see in them have been completely purged from yourself? I only question here, I do not rant.

But I wonder whether the "hot light of society's condemnation" and the fact that this group will live "alone and despised" really matters. Surely other men in other times have lived under these burdens and lived well. Society's eye is always turned, outward, and only sees that "evil" which it cannot see in itself. But that is not to say that the perversion, the evil does not, indeed, exist in society itself. Perhaps it does. Perhaps "those other are you!"

In conclusion let me say that I have taken your editorial seriously, as being an indication of your innermost beliefs and principles. Perhaps you have not written it sincerely but, with a certain wilfulness common to your clique, have thrown it out as a conversation piece. If this is so, then this letter is, at best, only marks on a page, with so much meaning as you yourself have.

The Group of One.

Betty Jean Hagen

Another full house set the rafters ringing in the Great Hall of Hart House Sunday evening. They were applauding the violin artistry of Miss Betty-Jean Hagen, who has lately been making the headlines abroad.

Her program was, to say the least, difficult. And yet, she approached it boldly, drawing freely on her well developed technique. Leo Barkin's accompaniment, as we have come to expect, was capable, discreet, and interpretive.

Miss Hagen's warming-up number was Handel's G-minor Sonata. Regrettably we had to wait until later for her tone to sweeten. But we did catch a glimpse of her forceful attack and careful phrasing.

Three selections from Bach caused some doubts as to her handling of double and triple stopping, but these doubts were later dispelled in Poeme by Chausson. It was in this number, which suffers from an overdose of romanticism, that her tone reached its height. The difficult stopping was carried off extremely well, even with an air of bravado.

The most remarkable feature of Miss Hagen's playing is her precise sense of intonation. Even in the highest register, she would attack a note, fortissimo and fully exposed, and hit it squarely on. And in rapid, cross-the-string passage as well, her intonation and rhythm were perfect.

A sonata by Brahms, opus 108, provided her with wonderful material for expression. She took every advantage to imbue her reading with balance, sensitivity, and meaning. Brahms, especially in his chamber works, is often played as if he were an irascible pedant; however at no time in this performance did we feel bored or imposed upon.

The concluding number (except for a beautifully rendered Kreisler arrangement played as encore) was Bartok's Roumanian Folk Dances. In this short set Miss Hagen combined all the color and enthusiasm which her instrument could produce. Both the facility and the lyricism of the peasant idiom simply sang from the violin in broad, strident phrases or skipping figures.

There is no doubt of Miss Hagen's future, lofty stature among international artists. Even now she can be called a great violinist. This was verified by Mr. Barkin's careful and thoroughly sympathetic approach to the accompaniment. It was good to welcome her home again.

Social Criticism In Poetry

With studied casualness the poet stood up and read. He had a good voice and his poetry read well. He prefaced his individual poems with pertinent anecdotal remarks.

This describes F. R. Scott, Canadian poet and professor of Constitutional Law, when he read at the Greenwich Gallery last Friday night. But it does not describe Scott's verse and his unique personality.

Reading to a capacity audience numbering sixty-odd, Scott's satire and well-turned phrases did not fall on deaf ears. Present was such talent as Roy Souster, Peter Miller, Alfred Purdey, Ken McRobbie and the University's own songstress, Jay Macpherson.

Scott's reading was actually a capsule comment on his own poetical development from the days of "the rarified atmosphere of English Quebec" with its nineteenth century "landscape" verse.

Then, while editing the "Fortnightly Review" with A. J. M. Smith and A. M. Klein, his technique and interests expanded: This waiting is wanting.

It will choose its language
When it has chosen its tech-nic,
A tongue to shape the vowels of its productivity.
The language of blood and of roses.

Last week's concert given at the Eaton Auditorium by Odetta was an unequalled success. Seldom does the blasé Toronto audience show as much vigor when calling for encores, and seldom does the artist deserve such an applause.

Odetta, a very attractive young singer, has many assets: a powerful deep voice; a style of singing sufficiently authentic for the idiom, but not insufferably basic; a brilliant guitar-playing technique; a feeling for and understanding of the material she sings; and finally, of course, her ability to shrink the huge auditorium down to a tres intime living room. Odetta seems to know exactly how the sophisticated audience appreciate her subtle comments, and together with her straightforward and unspoiled stage manner communicated, almost hypnotically, with the delighted listeners.

The repertoire consisted of blues, spirituals, folk-songs and "He's Got the Whole World in His Hands". In particular, the emotional impact of "Bald-Headed Woman", a Southern prison song, was overwhelming. Odetta put the guitar aside and to the beat of her tapping foot she sang a loud, tough blues, employing a sharp, whip-like hand-clap throughout the song for cross rhythm. What a gal!

She was equally magnificent on the true folksy "The Gallows Pole", the tender "Hush Little Baby" and humorous "Why". The whole program was a perfect invitation to love folk-music, something I had unfortunately neglected until then. It also pointed out to me in contrast, how artistically empty and commercial most jazz-packed concerts have been. Can we hope for a jazz concert of equal value?

Seeing Montreal and the French-Canadian scene from the vantage point of Burma, Scott's "A Grain of Rice" envisions man's common condition:

hundreds of millions live
Only because of the certainty of the season,

The turn of the wind.

The first half of the reading was concluded with "Vagrant", vigorous self-appraisal of Montreal, Canada and himself: now you may see him vir-ginal
content to live in montreal

The short intermission ended with translations from Scott's forthcoming book. Selections from Anne Hebert, Trotter, Giguere and other French-Canadian poets were read in an animated voice.

And a good time was had by all... but more important the audience, left feeling the effects of good verse. They had not seen the world anew as Scott described it, but they had felt his compassion when, in the concluding poem "Calamity", as a laundry truck crashes into his maple tree,

Dogs barked, and the children Sprouted like dandelions on my lawn.

Normally we do not speak to one another on this avenue,
But the excitement made us suddenly neighbours.

People exchanged remarks
Who had never been introduced

And for a while we were quite human. . . .

Great Hall Like St. Mark's

The Great Hall of Hart House was filled to capacity Saturday night on the occasion of the Tri-University Concert. Three choirs, a grand total of two hundred and fifty voices, provided an excellent fare of choral music, not likely to be repeated often.

The only guest choir was the University of Rochester Women's Glee Club under the direction of Ward Woodbury. Their program was the most ambitious and the most difficult of the three.

Starting with Thomas Arne's "Which is the properest Day To Sing?" the choir displayed an adequate style for eighteenth century music. Next, this group sang a Kyrie from a mass by Antonio Lotti, a very obscure composer of the Venetian school, probably born in 1667, and a onetime organist at St. Mark's.

The first chorus from Bach's cantata no 106 (Gottes Zeit) was attempted by the Rochester group, and from a technical aspect this performance left much to be desired. Their closing selections, however, two pieces by William Schuman, were notable for their clarity and spirit.

Next, the University of Toronto mixed chorus was heard, conducted by Dr. Richard Johnston. Earl George's setting of five poems of William Blake, The Songs of Innocence, were delightful in their noble simplicity; such a choir is a credit to this university.

The combined choirs then provided the first aesthetic thrill of the evening: Gabrieli's (this spelling is more common than the one on the program) "Magnificat", which overpowered the audience. What a display of architectonic might! The Great Hall was, for a few sublime moments St. Mark's in Venice.

The Hart House Glee Club, under the direction of its new conductor, Rowland Pack, presented the most solid musical facade of the concert. In volume and expression, the Glee Club and its new director took all laurels.

The grand finale reduplicated the Gabrieli experience. Ward Woodbury, the conductor of the Rochester group, took the podium for Thompson's "Alleluia", a moving, jubilant piece of work, effectively rendered. The concert closed with Tchaikovsky's Hymn to the Trinity No. 3, and the combined choirs were expertly directed by Rowland Pack.

CCF Seek Platform, Leader Soon

Resolutions for an upcoming campus CCF convention are being submitted thick and fast, club vice-president Peter Dembski said last night.

Resolutions include resolutions on Algeria, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the Queen, Canadian neutrality and divorce and liquor laws, he said.

Convention delegates will pick a party leader for the Model Parliament, as well as deciding on a party platform.

Those already completing for top spot include Hugh Peacock (II UC), Jack Parness (III UC), Bogden Kipling (III UC), Diane Jackman (II Vic) and club president Gerry Caplan.

The convention is planned for Dec. 3 and is open to anyone not a member of another campus political party.

Party chief Caplan is temporarily in hospital with an injured knee, Dembski said.

SWIMMERS SET RELAY RECORD

Pair Of Rookies Star As Blues Top EMAC

Picking up where they left off in record-shattering fashion last season, Varsity swim Blues set a new Canadian native medley relay in their very first meet Friday night.

Coach Bill Yorzyk moved a pair of freshmen in with veterans John Ridpath and Walt Unger, and the quartet finished the 200-yard distance in 4:07.2 minutes.

John Deacon, from Upper Canada College, and Hamilton's Mike McLoughlin were the rookies. Etobicoke, against whom Blues were swimming in the meet, were 18.3 seconds behind.

Final score in the meet was a surprising 50-36 for Varsity, who won seven of the ten events, and added four seconds and four thirds.

Coach Yorzyk—holder of an Olympic gold medal—won two events, the 200-yard butterfly and the 220-yard freestyle. He and freshman Bob Fisher from Lawrence Park were the only double winners.

Fisher, a versatile performer, raced to victory in the 50-yard freestyle, and outdistanced Blues' captain John Ridpath to win the 200-yard backstroke.

Kurt Pluntke, John Pirie, and Etobicoke's 400-yard sprint relay team captured the visitors' three firsts. Pluntke won the 100-yard freestyle, and Pirie the 440-yard freestyle.

Pluntke also swam on the freestyle relay team, which won the event in 3:41.7 minutes, 18 seconds ahead of Varsity's quartet.

Blues now prep for their first Intercollegiate exhibition meet, that taking them to Buffalo State on December 6. The Intercollegiate championships will be held at McGill on February 28.

Casey, Kennedy Pace Varsity In 10-3 Win Over Brampton

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

Unleashing the scoring punch long expected of them, Varsity Blues trounced Brampton Lyndhursts 10-3 at the Arena Friday night.

Scoring four goals in the first period and six in the third, Blues performed as a polished, powerful hockey unit. Only in the second frame were Lyndhursts able to hold Blues in check, and at the same time take advantage of faltering Varsity defensive play, to score three goals.

Bill (Bear) Kennedy led the Varsity attack with six points, scoring three goals and assisting on three others. Linemates Dunc Brodie and Howie (Li'l Bear) Roth, combined with Kennedy to provide a colorful and potent scoring line.

Ron Casey, not only provided stalwart defensive work at the blue line, but fired two goals, and assisted on three more.

The line of Mike Elik, John Macdonald, and Grant Mills turned in a remarkable display of razzle dazzle passing. Their ability to control the puck in enemy territory resulted in two goals that left Lyndie's goalie Freddie Coles, helpless.

A third unit of Frank Sullivan, Don Fleming, and Jim Brooks provided the Blues with a hard-digging, checking line. Particularly effective in the corners, this trio can give high-scoring opposing lines a lot of trouble.

This game provided the Varsity hockey fans with the last chance to see the Blues in action before their jaunt to Laval and McGill in the schedule openers.

Mat Blues Chase Title

By MIKE CHYKALIUK
Varsity Staff Reporter

The University of Toronto grunt and groaners last week began serious training for the recapture of the Porter Trophy, emblematic of Intercollegiate senior wrestling supremacy.

"Last year's team didn't fare too well," confided coach Jack Amos. This season, with a strong nucleus of veterans returning, including Rod Carrow, Bill Polito, Roger Doner, Don Shepley and Andy Higgins, promises to be more fruitful.

Frank Brown, last year's Intercollegiate senior champion, from OAC at Guelph, is attending Varsity to complete his degree and will be this year's heavyweight representative.

Despite the carry-over of veterans, many of the nine weight divisions are still open, especially the lighter weights.

Anyone who is interested in developing his strength, speed, endurance and agility is invited to turn out for this, the "oldest and best all-round sport in the history of civilization."

Expert instruction is provided by Jack Amos, Kirk Wipper, Kenney Leyachon, former Western great, and Victor Yerrab, 137-

McGill Defeated 7-6 In Water Polo Play

On Saturday afternoon the Varsity waterpolo team went into a narrow lead in the two game total point series with McGill as they beat the Redmen 7-6.

The first quarter saw McGill surge to a 2-0 lead, chiefly due to some quick swimming by Cameron Grout. Canadian Empire Games representative, and it appeared as if Blues were unprepared for the onslaught.

In the second quarter, however, Varsity took over and for the latter part of the period had almost complete possession of the ball. Despite this, they were only able to score one goal, that by Mike Stipetic.

During this period, many fine movements were initiated by Mike McLoughlin, who played a great game and scored three goals.

Starting the third period, Blues really came to life and tore into the Redmen, hammering home five goals, including two by Dave Berger and one by captain Art Binner.

Apparently satisfied with this lead, the Blues cooled down and were lucky to win through a fine goal in the dying minutes by McLoughlin.

Swarms of Metro Police Stop Singing Skulemen

Police broke up an early-morning street dance staged by about 30 engineers in front of the Park Plaza Hotel's King Cole Room in the wee small hours of Friday.

The dance had been going on for around a half hour and consisted mainly of Virginia reels and square dances. The law arrived just as a bunny hop was beginning.

The few policemen soon got further support from a swarm of reinforcements complete with a paddy-wagon.

The group, swollen to about 50, retired to the south side of Bloor St. and started down Philosophers' Walk.

Encouraged by a bugle the gang proceeded in a succession of cavalry charges towards Trinity College.

They serenaded the college with the Skule song, among others and were answered by a deluge of water from Trinity residents.

The group proceeded to the Engineering Building, stopping briefly to serenade staffers in The Varsity office.

Plans to fire the Skule cannon were discussed, but only a number of tussles with Artsmen occurred and the group broke up after a final Engineering cheer.

Claim Professor "Victim" In Manitoba Firing Case

Prof. Harry S. Crowe dismissed from his post at Winnipeg's United College, Aug. 2, has been described as a "victim of injustice" based on "less than a shred of evidence."

A report issued by a special committee of the Canadian Association of University Teachers, and made public last night, severely criticizes United College president Dr. W. H. Lockhart for making improper use of a personal letter from Prof. Crowe to a colleague.

The letter was main issue in the decision of the college to dismiss the professor with one year's notice. He was subsequently summarily fired after an exchange of communications over salary and contract terms.

Contents of the letter involved are not made public in the committee's 78-page report.

Members of the three-man committee are: Bora Laskin, professor of law at the University of Toronto; Martin W. Johns, professor of physics at McMaster University; and Vernon C. Fowke, professor of economics at the University of Saskatchewan, chairman of the group.

Dr. Lockhart's reading of Prof. Crowe's letter is described by the committee as "an invasion of personal privacy."

It was, the report adds, "an unjust and unwarranted invasion of the security of academic tenure to which he was entitled."

A rebuttal to the vindication of Dr. Crowe by the CUAT has followed quickly from the United Church of Canada.

"Nothing in (the committee's) report or in the circumstances which it reflects shakes the confidence of the United Church in the integrity of Dr. Lockhart and the Board of the College, or in their common devotion to the interests of education at its best in United College and beyond," an official press statement from the church says.

The board recommended that the United College Board of Regents invite Prof. Crowe to resume teaching duties at the rank he had when dismissed and at a salary level in keeping with his ability and length of service.

The letter lying at the bottom of the issue was written by Prof. Crowe from Kingston, Ont. where he was on loan to Queen's University and was addressed to W. A. Packer, associate professor of German at United College.

Editors Propose Plan To Settle UofO Issue

OTTAWA — CUP — A compromise move came yesterday in the month-long dispute between students and administration of the University of Ottawa.

The move came from the three student editors of La Rotonde banned from their posts last Oct. 24 by Rev. Leonard Ducharme, Dean of Men.

In a letter to Father Ducharme, Louis Cliche, Pierre Trudel and Roger Roy agreed to "renounce" their editorship if the Dean lifted the interdiction against them.

Present deadlock came after the U of O students' council refused to accept the editors' resignation after the Dean had fired them.

If the Dean accepts the compromise and lifts the ban, he will admit the administration was at fault by interfering in student affairs, sources here say.

By "renouncing" their posts rather than "resigning" from them, the editors would make the move a "fait accompli". The students' council would not be in a position to accept or not accept.

The editors' "conciliatory proposal" said they would renounce their posts "within eight days" of the Dean's lifting the ban against them.

The letter asked the Dean to reply by tomorrow evening because the matter will be discussed at a students' council meeting.

Sources here say a motion to "dissolve" the student newspaper altogether will be placed before the council if the Dean refuses the compromise.

What do you think of the proposals of President Bissell's advisory committee on student aid?

Do you want to see the future of the Canadian university formed along the lines proposed? Does the plan frighten you, do you like it, dislike it?

Would you have wanted to go to university under the conditions proposed? The Varsity wants the opinion of every student on this important issue.

See page four of today's Varsity where a special information blank is provided for your opinion.

Pro-Oratorical Petition To Hit St. Mike's SAC

The St. Michael's College Students' Administrative Council is to be presented tonight with a petition urging it to implement plans put forward by the SMC Oratorical Society which would place all SMC debating under the jurisdiction of the Orators.

The signatories, headed by Richard Tan (I SMC) feel that the SMC Senate Club, which has been promised a privileged position in all debates outside the college, "do not justly represent St. Mike's in all debating," Tan said last night.

The petition is the latest development in a long-standing controversy between the Senate and the Oratorical Clubs at the College.

The SAC several weeks ago promised to give the Senators and the Circle priority in all debates outside the college as soon as they had reached a high standard of debating.

The Senate Club has been sharply criticized recently on the grounds that it is an exclusive organization.

Bob Carberry, Senate Club president, last night said he doesn't "see any point" in the petition.

The problem of debating at the college, Carberry said, has been settled "as far as we're concerned."

The petition reads in part: "We . . . wholeheartedly endorse the plan put forward by the Oratorical Society—namely that a new debating organization . . . be formed merging the present Senate Club and the Forensic Circle in the framework of the Oratorical Society . . ."

SMC SAC

Finance "Gryphon" If It's Good

The St. Mike's Gryphon received firm financial backing from the SMC Students' Administrative Council executive last night, but the magazine's future is far from secure.

Appropriation for publication of the Gryphon will be withheld "if it becomes apparent that the magazine will not be of a high literary standard", council president

Mike McCabe said last night.

When the SMC Writer's Group apparently died a quiet death this fall, money for the magazine was earmarked for a graduation banquet, McCabe said.

But the SAC executive last night found it could finance the banquet from other sources, and restore the Gryphon appropriation, he said.

Most members of the Writer's Group graduated last year, and no editor could be found this year to edit the magazine. But three weeks ago Miss Joan Bulger revived the Group at the initiative of Rev. B. Hennessey. Members hope to produce a literary magazine next term.

"I doubt very much whether there are enough creative writers at St. Mike's to produce a literary magazine", McCabe said last night.

However the SMC SAC is "prepared to give this group our full cooperation provided they show they are capable of producing a good magazine", he said.

M McCabe said the university English department is "still teaching in the Victorian era".

The university "does not create an intellectual climate conducive to creative writing", he said.

"Far from fostering creative thought, the English department of the university does more to suppress it", he said.

Miss Bulger was not available for comment last night.

Sane Sunday Group Back Karfilis Plan

A newly-formed students' group is trying to mobilize campus opinion to help brighten up Toronto's Sundays.

Spearheading the campaign on campus to elect Jim ("Brighter Sunday") Karfilis to Metropolitan Toronto Board of Control is The Students' Action League for a Sane Sunday (SALSS) headed by Pierre Leduc, III SMC.

The League has scheduled an old-style banner-waving political rally for 1 p.m. Wednesday around the band-shell in Queen's Park. At the rally, the 31-year-old Board of Control candidate will outline his plans for legislating a brighter Sunday into existence — and tell how students can help.

According to Mr. Karfilis, Toronto's blue laws are maintained by a "highly vocal" minority, against the widely-held but seldom-expressed views of most Torontonians that theatres, concerts and other cultural activities should be allowed to operate unfettered on the Sabbath.

Leduc and Karfilis are both opposed to Sunday opening of taverns, however.

Lifelong Security Through

NFCUS LIFE Plan

Exclusive to University Students at this UNMATCHED low cost.

$10,000 for only $35.00 PER YEAR $5,000 for only $17.50 PER YEAR

Underwritten and guaranteed by Canadian Premier Life Insurance Company — a Canadian Company with federal charter, licensed in all provinces of Canada, from coast-to-coast and backed financially by insurance interests with assets exceeding $330 millions.

PARTICULARS OF NFCUS LIFE PLAN

THE PLAN—Ordinary Life with special low-rate term insurance for first 10 years or to age 35, whichever is the shorter period.

AMOUNT OF INSURANCE—Minimum, $5,000. Maximum —no arbitrary limit, individual consideration.

THE PREMIUM—$3.50 per $1,000 annually during the term period; Ordinary Life rate thereafter. Ordinary Life rates are included and guaranteed in the NFCUS LIFE Plan policy.

ELIGIBILITY—All students who are members of the representative student society of this university are eligible for NFCUS LIFE Insurance.

EFFECTIVE DATE OF INSURANCE—Insurance under each policy takes effect immediately upon the issue of the policy by the Company, whether the first premium has been paid or not.

TOTAL DISABILITY BENEFIT—If totally disabled your protection is continued in force without further payment of premiums. If still disabled when term period expires, your protection is automatically continued in force on the Ordinary Life plan for the same amount of insurance with all premiums on the new plan waived until death or earlier recovery.

PRIOR CONVERSION OPTION—While the plan automatically becomes Ordinary Life at the end of the term period, there is an option for prior conversion to Ordinary Life at guaranteed rates without further evidence of insurability. Also, conversion to any Limited Payment Life, Endowment or Pension plan may be arranged.

CONVERSION AGE—NFCUS LIFE Plan policies may be converted at the attained age at the date of conversion; or at the age as of the original date of issue of the policy, in which case credit will be given for ALL premiums paid in addition to the conversion credit of $2.50 per $1,000 (see below).

REDUCTION IN FIRST YEAR PREMIUM ON CHANGE OR CONVERSION—A reduction of $2.50 per $1,000 of insurance will be allowed from the first premium payable upon the change to Ordinary Life at the end of the term period, or upon conversion of your NFCUS LIFE policy to any plan at any time. For example, if converted at age 25 to $10,000 Ordinary Life the first year premium would be $125.40 reduced by $25.00 leaving a net amount payable of $100.40.

ADDITIONAL COVERAGE FOR ACCIDENTAL DEATH—Policies may include an Accidental Death Provision at an extra premium of $1.25 per $1,000. This provision will pay the amount of the Accidental Death Benefit in addition to the face amount of the policy in the event of accidental death.

GENEROUS SETTLEMENT OPTIONS—The NFCUS LIFE Plan contains attractive settlement options whereby the insured at maturity, or the beneficiary, may elect to take the proceeds of the policy in a variety of instalments or on a life annuity basis guaranteed for either 10 years or 20 years but payable in any event for life.

RIGHT TO ASSIGN—You have the right to assign your NFCUS LIFE policy. This is valuable as an assistance in obtaining loans (for example, for educational purposes) as in this way the lender may be given a guarantee of payment in the event of premature death.

GRACE PERIOD—A period of 30 days of grace is allowed for the payment of any premium including the first.

NON-PARTICIPATING—The NFCUS LIFE Plan is non-participating during the term period, however, at conversion, you may select either a participating or non-participating permanent plan.

AVIATION COVERAGE—Death occurring as a result of air flight is covered except where you are the pilot or member of the crew.

NO WAR CLAUSE—There is no restriction as to the payment of death benefits if death occurs as a result of war, declared or undeclared, except as outlined for air flight.

Exotic Stuff For Old UC

Howard Ferguson Hall ordinarily presents a sedate face to the campus.

But within its depths is to be found now an exotic display of all the treasures of the world.

This is Treasure Van.

Here you can buy an emerald ring from Peru for $750, or a glass bangle from the Orient for 10 cents.

Shrunken heads from Africa, dangling earrings from Thailand, shimmering with a secret silver process, or a wedding sari from India are among these fascinating items.

A grey-haired woman has travelled around the world to gather them. She is Mrs. Ethel Mulvaney, who truly is a person in love with her work.

She is not proud of any one treasure in particular. She loves everything. "All of it!"

Mrs. M., as she is known, shows visitors to Treasure Van llama slippers from Peru, or as she says, "yama" slippers. She wears Algarrobina beans from South America, used by the Indians to brew cocktails.

Mrs. M. was at "WUS and Us Night", presented last night by the World University Service of Canada, at Howard Ferguson Hall.

Treasure Van and Mrs. Mulvaney will be there from Nov. 25 to 28 when all these articles will be on sale.

WUSC uses the proceeds of these sales to provide for mutual assistance, international education and research.

Portrait Of Life As A Chess Game

By LIZ BINKS
Varsity Features Editor

Few games have fascinated men so completely and for so long as the game of chess.

Experts say its origins have been lost in obscurity, that it dates back as far as man has known civilization and culture.

We know that Voltaire played chess, Einstein, Turgenev, Kant and Stalin. And history tells us that before the battle of Borodino, using one of the most expressive metaphors known to language, Napoleon said: "The chess pieces are set up — the game will start tomorrow".

In Europe, especially in the Slavic countries, chess knows the same popularity as hockey or baseball here. Newspapers devote long columns to it; huge demonstration boards are set up in public squares while neon signs announce each move of national tournaments; public auditoriums the size of Massey Hall are rented regularly and the audience follows closely with binoculars and portable chess sets.

A third year Medical student, former lecturer in U of T's department of Slavic Studies and lecturer in Russian for the Extension department, grew up in this tradition in Belgrade, Yugoslavia.

was a tremendous strain which time and again I found was relieved by what I had learned from chess."

"To play it properly I had to teach myself to think objectively and I soon found this applied to my way of thinking in everything. I began to see variations for every situation."

He smiled wryly. "After two games with an opponent I know more about him as a person than I would after hours of conversation with him."

He grinned again recalling one opponent who had smoked six cigarettes before one move and then resigned.

The theories behind the game demand far more than merely moving pieces across a board, he explained. It has many of the exciting elements of physical sport. The great Soviet masters, he said, have regular training programs before their tournaments, which include swimming, gymnastics and racing.

A well-played move in chess can have as much aesthetic appeal for its devotees as a painting or piece of music has for an art lover. It is a test for the scientific mind and it requires long and regular study.

An average game between two masters is about 40 moves apiece,

George Berner, 36, began playing chess at the age of 10, by the age of 12 was admitted to one of the city's adult clubs and by 18 was one of the youngest players ever to win the title of "chess master".

He's been at it ever since.

"The game of chess is one of my greatest friends," Berner explains gravely. "This may sound strange to people who do not know the game, but it can be one of the great teachers, one of the great supports of a man's life."

"During the war I was engaged in what you might call 'passive resistance' against the Nazis. It he is actually letting his opponent kill himself on the board."

Often, Berner explained the most experienced chess player will fall victim to what professionals call "chess blindness."

"This happened to me," he said, during the only game I ever played against S. Gligoric, now grand master in Yugoslavia. I walked knowingly into a trap he set for me because I could not help it."

"And it was a strange thing. Up until this point there had been a tremendous thunder storm raging outside. But once I had completed my move, it stopped."

"I'm not usually superstitious about the game," he added quickly. "But that is one I will never forget. And I would like to meet Gligoric again some day and reverse the trick."

Berner's adventures in chess tournaments did not stop when he arrived in Canada in 1951. In 1953 he entered and played fourth in the Canadian Chess championships in Winnipeg; in 1956 and '57 he taught evening courses in chess for the U of T Extension Department and last year taught youngsters the rudiments of the game at Rose Ave. Community Centre.

In 1955 he and another expert, Frank Anderson, a U of T physics graduate, put Hart House under spotlights when they took on 100 opponents in a special tandem exhibition in the Great Hall that set a North American record.

Berner said, although some of the longest games recorded are well over 100.

"The longest I ever played was 80 moves in a single game," he said, and after some probing admitted he could take on up to 50 boards at once and up to 10 blindfolded.

"Blindfolded chess is great fun," he said, warning to the subject. "You have to memorize the boards first and then keep them all in mind as you relate your moves to an in-between man."

"Then, in a really exciting game, you get the elements of time pressure, or 'Zeitnot' as it is called in German. This is because each player is allowed two hours a game or an average of three minutes each move."

"But often a player will take almost all his time to complete only a few moves and will have as many as 20 moves to finish in two minutes."

"If one man is particularly good at fast play he will deliberately lure his opponent into this time pressure at the end. By pretending to kill himself on the clock,

"I have often thought it would be fun to try a chess festival here like the ones they have in Europe," he said. "One of the best is called 'live chess'."

"To do this you mark out a large field like a giant chess board. Then you use real people — a ballerina for the Queen and men on horse back — and act out a short pre-arranged game. This way you can combine all sorts of media — music, dancing, acting, riding, etc. — and get a beautiful effect."

"On this campus," he added,

"you could make excellent use of cheerleaders and majorettes."

"I would love to see the same enthusiasm here for it as there is in Europe," he said wistfully. "In Yugoslavia they have no need for schools or courses — the clubs are so active. Besides playing, they hold analytical evenings, discussion groups, debates — the sessions are vibrating. But perhaps TV and radio will do the same here some day. I feel it could do a lot to combat social evils like juvenile delinquency."

"Pretty soon my wife and I will have to start teaching our two daughters," he added with a smile. "Right now they are only two and four years — a little young, even for chess!"

Less Emphasis On Outside World Is Aim Of Classical Universities

President Claude Bissell last week followed up the U of T's new tuition proposals by reviving the idea of the university as a community isolated from society.

The subject of the address, given at a dinner meeting of the University Women's Club, was "The University Community."

Dr. Bissell described the classical concept of the university as "a group of scholars making up a society that is self-regulated and self-governed."

"This is virtually a society of elite and its relationship to the outside world is not emphasized," he said. "In many ways it is an austere and aristocratic society."

This concept, Dr. Bissell said, had never been successfully exported to America, where there has always been less cleavage between the university and the world outside. But this had led to a breakdown in the university's sense of cohesion and unity, he said.

"There is a widening gap between students and teachers, and a multiplication of faculties and schools and institutes." Both these developments had made for difficulties in preserving the sense of a unified community, Dr. Bissell said.

He said that professional training is a legitimate goal of university education but warned that with specialization at an early age, "the student begins to think of himself not as a person in search of intellectual excitement and illumination, but rather as a specialized technologist waiting to take his place in an assembly line."

The university of the future would be able to solve this problem, he said. Automation will mean more and more time for education and "instead of hustling the student from secondary school into the eager embrace of professionalism, we can afford, I think, to extend the principle of the general liberal education as a prologue to professional education," he said.

With increasing expansion, Dr. Bissell said, the university will be "a community that draws far more deeply than ever in the past on new Canadians particularly those who have recently arrived from Europe and on social classes that before never conceived of university education as being among their legitimate aspirations."

"Indeed education may well become our major industry," he said.

The debate will begin at 8.30 p.m. in the Hart House Debates Room.

Both teams will visit Vaughan Road Collegiate high school Thursday afternoon to argue the topic "Resolved, that Communist China should be admitted to the United Nations." The debate is part of a UTDU program of visiting Toronto high schools throughout the year.

Debaters Face UWO

Women will be welcome when Toronto debaters will take on opponents from the University of Western Ontario Thursday night.

U of T Debating Union members Mac Wallace and Mike Thompson will side with the noes on the topic "University Education Should be a Prerogative of the Intellectual Elite." D'Arcy Luxton and Peter Brown will uphold the affirmative for Western.

atomic future

The United Nations Club will glimpse the possibilities of an atomic world today.

Dr. Roderick Ross of the U of T Physics department will address an open meeting of the club on "The Future of Atomic Energy" in Trinity's room 4 at 4 p.m.

Dr. Ross is a lecturer in mathematics and physics, ignorant armies

Most Canadians seem to fall into one of two categories. There are those who believe that the Statute of Westminster is the most important piece of legislation of the century and there are those who after 27 years still cannot believe it has been passed.

They clash periodically. The latest clash occurred when three members of Toronto's Board of Control walked out of a Native Sons of Canada banquet when they learned God Save the Queen would not be played when the Queen was toasted.

In one corner, wearing red, white and blue trunks, were Controllers, Newman, Allen and Cornish. In the other corner wearing trunks decorated with maple leaves were the Native Sons of Canada. Both groups made it clear they had had previous bouts. "I fought in the second war" said Con. Cornish. "I fought in the last war, was discharged and went back in," said a Native Son.

But in spite of all their previous combat experience, the warriors did not come to blows.

Betting on the match had not been heavy. Not that Canadians are not anxious to take sides in this kind of a fight, but that it was a bit difficult to figure out which side was which.

The Native Sons for one thing had presumably not refused to toast the Queen only to play God Save the Queen, during the toast.

And the Controllers after all said they had no objection to the playing of O Canada as long as The Queen was played as well.

So the Native Sons do not really qualify as rabid Nationalists nor do the controllers qualify as rabid Colonialists.

As a matter of fact, the whole match seemed a bit pointless in a world where God has more important things to save than our gracious Queen and Canadians have more important things to stand on guard for than thee, O Canada.

Because the word is that there is a world championship bout coming up. There is still some doubt as to who the top contenders are. Some say East and West; but these two contenders are really in the same corner. Some say Democracy and Communism; but these two contenders are nowhere to be found.

The real contenders will be, on one side, the whole fighting game, fight promoters, managers, and the fighters themselves and on the other side those who believe that putting two combatants in opposite corners of the world and letting them fight it out is less than the ultimate in sport.

And this is no time to waste strength in preliminary bouts.

SA

our readers write:

...on the tuition plan

"The damn thing won't work"

Having read Dr. Bissell's proposals to renovate, no that's not the right word — revolutionize, education and also the editorial page of one of the Toronto papers (you know, "Suffer yourselves to be hanged, drawn and quartered, etc, but publish your opinions"), I felt it my duty as a red-blooded, rational Canadian who has been hanged, drawn and quartered to write this morsel of literature in humble protest against Doc's plans.

At its first reading, the plan appears as the dream of every university student incarnate. But then the "ifs", the "buts", and the "however's" are read, the pin jabbed in, and the dream is shattered; for to be eligible for free tuition, one must have first class honors; to be eligible for partial aid (whatever that means) one must have second class honors. No mention of aid to third class students (into which category, I dare say, 50% of students fall) is made.

Even taken thus far, however, the plan is not without merit. But Doc is not satisfied with this. He has to cut our vacation, and, even worse, break it up into three installments. Granted that even if every student (Hal) would be eligible for free tuition, his eminence fails to realize that, for the student, tuition is but a small cost of his education. He must clothe himself, buy his books, and, so that he can be angular, be a socialite, all of which costs money.

However, the proposed periods of vacation, during which time the student can work to contribute to his support, occur at a most inopportune time—a time when unemployment is at its peak. So how are we, the hol polloi, supposed to meet these costs?

But let us give credit where credit is due; for the plan, like the gold standard of old, is ingenious, unparalleled, wonderfully simple—as an hypothesis. There is only one thing wrong with it—it is impractical, unfeasible, and untenable, or, in a more colourful language of the omniscient engineers — "the damn thing ain't gonna work." It is not a complete waste however; for it shows the boys who pay the salaries that Doc has been doing his homework. The fact that his answers are wrong is immaterial.

Stress Arts

Dear Sir:

May I take this opportunity to congratulate you on your fine editorial in Friday's issue of The Varsity.

As you wisely pointed out, the Bissell Committee report—presents valid issues for debate. In fact so drastic is it in some of its consequences that I have no hesitation in calling it revolutionary.

Generally my concern centers around the principle that governs the plan. What is the function of a university? An examination of the plan furnishes one with the answer that its progenitors have in mind. The emphasis is definitely on selective education. True, Society for its own sake cannot afford not to train such children of poor parents that show genuine promise. But Society must also guarantee ALL its citizens what I would term a social right, namely, the opportunity to benefit from higher education.

One may very well counter that this opportunity IS offered in our high schools and that only those who demonstrate ability to benefit therefrom should be given state support. Yet one cannot help feeling that the third class student has his place in the university.

What advantages the university offers consists in its atmosphere, its groups where mind meets mind, its smoking rooms, its residences, its libraries, its contacts between student and professor—et hoc genus omne.

All have a right to membership in this fraternity. A man is hardly the same before and after leaving university, regardless of his academic performance and Society needs these illuminating minds to lighten the whole. It is on their good sense that it relies most for its security and for the preservation of its liberties.

In the last resort the function of education is civic and political. Thus we need to emphasize the humanities, and there can be no better way to do this than by making a two-year liberal arts course compulsory for all students. Only after this initial training should we begin to think in terms of selective education and the preparation of our specialists.

Plan Scan

The most important sidelight of last week's plan by President Bissell's Advisory Committee on Student Aid is the reaction from those it most concerns—the undergraduates themselves. As yet no reliable poll has been taken. In an attempt to get an intelligent cross-section of opinion, students are asked to fill in this ballot, clip it out and return it to The Varsity office today.

Do you approve of the over-all aim of the plan?

What specific points, if any, meet with your objection?

Would you like to attend university under such a system?

By Prof. MARCUS LONG

In 1947 Mr. Gordon Campbell the secretary of I.S.S. (now WUS) persuaded myself and the other members of the National Executive to promote an International Student Seminar in Germany in the summer of 1948.

It was an ambitious scheme. He envisaged 50 Canadian students meeting for six weeks with 50 Germans and 50 other European students, particularly those from the formerly occupied countries.

The first problem was financial. The Provincial Governments refused assistance at first on the grounds that the seminar was a national project; the Federal Government refused assistance on the grounds that it was educational and within the Provincial jurisdiction.

Fortunately the Canadian Council for reconstruction through UNESCO gave a substantial grant and the Saskatchewan Government broke through the governmental hesitation. We were able to sail as planned with 50 Canadian students from coast to coast.

Our troubles were far from over. The next troublesome question was the burning memory of the German occupation, particularly with the Dutch and Norwegian students. It was a lasting triumph of the project that the bitterness gradually dissolved into friendship and a greater understanding.

1948 will be recalled as the year of blockade of Berlin. We were sitting in a castle only a few miles from the Soviet Zone, hourly expecting war and our own seizure. One concerned parent phoned from Vancouver to order his daughter home. She disobeyed.

1948 was also the year of currency reform. When we arrived in Germany the people were close to starvation. We were first hand witnesses of the change brought by the drastic currency reform.

The British authorities, who excelled in generosity were a little perturbed at the amount of food we had brought and made available to the German students. In their opinion we were offering delicacies to young men and women who would have to return to near starvation.

No harmful results followed, so far as I know, from overeating. A continued correspondence with some of the European students testifies most eloquently to the lasting benefits the German student, who had known little but Hitlerism, derived from the contact with students raised in a free country.

Since then the WUS has exchanged this sort of essential contact with great skill and, I hope, less financial worries.

Those of us who were at Schloss Ploeu will still treat that first venture as an unforgettable experience and a rewarding adventure in international understanding.

To-night At 8:20

The world's most famous Shakespeare repertory company, will present their first play at the Royal Alexandra Theatre to-night at 8:20.

Housed in an historic theatre, the Royal Victoria Hall in London, and known affectionately as the Old Vic, it has housed the Shakespeare repertory company since 1914. Founded by Lillian Baylis, it is now operated under a distinguished Board of Governors, and three Directors: Sir Ralph Richardson, Sir Laurence Olivier and John Burrell.

In 1953 Michael Benthall was named Director of the Company, and immediately started an ambitious project to produce all the plays in the Shakespeare First Folio in a period of five years. "Hamlet" was the first production, and it played at Kronborg Castle and at the Edinburgh Festival that year. The project was completed this past season with "Henry VIII", Shakespeare's most neglected masterpiece.

During the 1956-57 season, Sol Hurok brought the Old Vic Company to America for its first tour, in a repertory of Shakespeare plays. This year he has secured their return for an even more extensive tour, ranging from San Francisco to Washington, and including Montreal and Toronto.

The three plays which have been chosen for this tour were considered the most representative of the First Folio, after having produced all thirty-six of the plays in the five year period Michael Benthall had planned. The plays will be "Hamlet", the greatest drama ever written in the English language, "Twelfth Night", Shakespeare's most popular comedy, and "Henry V", the most exciting of the historical plays. All three will be seen by Toronto audiences this week.

The company is headed by John Neville, who completes his fifth year with the Company

With the return showing of Tennessee Williams' A Streetcar Named Desire at the Odeon Carlton Theatre, the old controversy about the relative merits of films versus theatre may again be raised.

Those who decry movie versions of hit plays cite as examples Marcel Pagnol's Marius trilogy, Death Of A Salesman, Member of the Wedding, as well as the present film. That all these films are very enjoyable makes no difference. They are not cinematic.

In preparing a screenplay from a play which has its action confined to a small, cramped set, the screenwriter, if he wishes to give it a more cinematic treatment must figure out how, without destroying the playwright's conception. The present treatment of A Streetcar Named Desire goes about as far as it can go in presenting a theatrical play in an untheatrical manner, and yet, as a film, it is as much a failure as the Marius trilogy: there is little action outside the principal set; scenes are carried by the dialogue rather than by their pictorial interest; and even the blackout lines of the original stage production are preserved.

As a film, in which the visual takes precedence over the aural, this film is a failure. But does this lessen our enjoyment of it? I think not. We do not need to see long panoramic vistas of Niagara Falls or the Grand Canyon in glorious technicolor and stereophonic sound in order to be impressed by A Streetcar Named Desire. Stagnant as it is, it still carries a tremendous impact, something that Around The World In Eighty Days, with all its cinematic tricks, could never do.

It is a masterpiece of artistic honesty; Tennessee Williams faced the problems he raised in his most honest fashion, an attitude which he has sadly lacked in his subsequent plays; Elia Kazan directs with sincerity, never allowing his mannerisms, which have become since so annoying, to intrude upon the design.

Marlon Brando, despite his "Method" trappings, is essentially honest in his portrayal, as is Kim Stanley as Stella. And as for Vivien Leigh's performance of Blanche DuBois, the faded flower of Southern gentility, it is so sincere as to leave one gasping. It may even be a very convincing argument against presenting case histories on the stage.

The sordid milieu, in which Williams delights to wallow, is for once perfectly captured. Cat On A Hot Tin Roof is a glaring example of the dangers involved in using color tastelessly in mood movies.

The film really has only one fault: a curious coldness, evident even in the most violent scenes. It is a minor fault at worst, and one which fortunately does not noticeably spoil the classic Williams film.

The superb voice, exceptional artistry and dynamic personal appeal of Cesare Siepi, leading basso of the Metropolitan Opera, have made him world-famous. Two Jokes

Two film societies had showings over the weekend; both were fiascos. The University of Toronto Film Society's film was intended to be; not so the Toronto Film Society's effort.

TRUE FRIENDS is a Soviet comedy; as such, it is not a great film, but only a fairly light, enjoyable one. It pokes gentle fun at the bureaucratization of Soviet officials, and calls upon them to once more think of the people. Many of its incidents seem to be drawn from "Huckleberry Finn", such as the search for the bodies, or the concert at the small riverside town. To expect a great film from such slight material is to make a great mistake.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF ST. FRANCIS, however, seemed to be a big joke on a serious theme. Roberto Rossellini, who has never been noted for his love of the Catholic Church, directed the work with his tongue far too obviously in his cheek. A lecherous-looking St. Francis, a thieving monk who cuts off the foot of a pig for a starving brother, and later leaps from a twenty-five foot tower in a religious ecstasy, are some of the more disagreeable elements of this social satire. The Toronto Film Society's program was only saved by two of the three shorts: Watch The Birdie, a delightful amateur cartoon, and The Little Island, a thought-provoking cartoon made by a Canadian artist living in England. Never have two societies worked together so harmoniously to keep their audiences amused.

Trinity Drama

Teaching you the fine art of living is scarcely the point of William Saroyan's "The Cave Dwellers", although the setting of this two act play by the celebrated Armenian-American playwright is the stage of an abandoned theatre.

Housekeeping in these unusual surroundings is in the capable hands of an aged actress (Ruth Ann Scott), a once famous clown (Thomas Drew-Brook), and a former boxing champion (Wilson McTavish).

This company of outcasts is joined by a frightened girl (Jackie Burroughs). With typical Saroyan charm, and acceptance of the fantastic, the old building, soon to be demolished, is to shelter a trained bear (Pat Weston) with his owner (Garrick Hagon), and wife (Eve Hargraff), who presents him with a son at the stage door. These arrivals are soon adopted into a strange family, and the new light shed on their shared problems is Saroyan's lesson to us in human charity.

The lesson is portrayed with gentle humor that, under Pam Terry's proven direction ("Waiting For Godot"), insures an evening of relaxing, delightful entertainment. Don't miss it at Hart House, Dec. 10-13. Tickets $1.25.

Gary Plaxton as George Apley and Jannet Ford as his exasperated sister, appear in "The Late George Apley" at Hart House this Saturday and all next week.

Radio Industrialist Describes Broadcasting For Civil Defence

A radio industrialist last night described a recently-developed emergency civil defence broadcasting system at the Hart House Amateur Radio Club's second Open Meeting.

Mr. H. Z. Rogers, of the Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd., showed how this "transportable" station could be used in almost any climate and by persons of little technical training. By means of colored lights, operation is virtually foolproof, he said.

Mr. Rogers said the simplicity of the station is detracted from only by the fact that it requires two men four hours to erect the 150-foot antenna which is carried on the roof of the studio vehicle. This experimental equipment is undergoing testing at night by CD officials, he said. These test broadcasts can be picked up by any standard radio and listener reports are appreciated. This station would be used in an area where existing stations need replacement because of emergency.

Blame McMaster Men For U of T Flag Theft

LONDON (CUP) — Two McMaster students have been blamed for the theft of a U of T standard taken from Varsity Stadium during a football game several weeks ago and returned to the Toronto campus only last week.

The standard was taken by the McMaster students and Western supporters during the Thanksgiving weekend game between the Western Mustangs and the Blues. Sources here say the standard was dropped at the Hall Porter's office in Hart House last week.

The action in returning the flag was praised by Western Athletic director and football coach Johnny Metras. "To them it was just a prank—they didn't realize how valuable it was," he said.

Queen's Alters Stand — Won't Leave Nfcus

KINGSTON (CUP) — The Queen's University Alma Mater Society reversed their policy last week and ended their threat to walk out of the National Federation of Canadian University Students.

The four-hour session saw a previous AMS decision—to stop paying Nfcus dues, and to send letters protesting Nfcus' foreign policy—defeated.

Nfcus president Mortimer Bistrisky outlined the federation's stand on all foreign matters. He justified action in sending protests against treatment of Algerian students by the French, apartheid in South Africa, and segregation in the United States.

AMS members had previously voted to stop payment of dues because they felt such protests were not part of the job of the federation. Failure to pay dues would have meant a virtual withdrawal from Nfcus.

Bistrisky pointed out the motion had been passed by a wide majority of members at the annual Nfcus convention in October.

SOCCER BLUES EDGE MICHIGAN

Goaltender Vello Soots Spectacular In Varsity's Narrow 2-0 Victory

By PAUL AVIS
Varsity Staff Correspondent

Ann Arbor, Mich. [Nov. 23]—The Varsity Soccer Blues came up with two second-half goals to register a 2-0 victory over the University of Michigan Wolverines in a hard-fought battle, played here today.

The defeat was the first that the Wolverines had suffered in two years of Intercollegiate competition. The game was the first exhibition contest that Blues had played in five years, and was staged as part of an International Week held on the Michigan Campus.

Cheered on by a large partisan crowd, Wolverines started the game at a torrid pace and held Blues in their own end of the field. Varsity had trouble settling down on the rather small field and for a while it seemed that the Michigan team would take the lead.

However the entire Blues' defence proved equal to the task of keeping Varsity in the game. Most of the credit must go to Vello Soots, Blues' goalkeepers who made many good saves, four of which bordered on the miraculous. On two occasions he had Wolverine forwards holding their heads in anguish as he performed the impossible in keeping the Blues' goal intact.

Spurred on by Soots' heroics Blues began to settle down and by the midway mark of the first half they were getting their licks in at the Michigan goal. Wolverines defence held Blues' forwards at a fair distance from the home goal and most of the Varsity shots were from well out.

Gradually Varsity halfbacks Norm Shepherd and Cabby Green moved from defensive to offensive soccer and controlled the play in mid-field. With these two combining well with inside forwards Bruno Bertolin and Roger Peretz the game began to swing in favour of Blues. Bertolin and Peretz fed wingmen Stew Bell and Bill Webb with pin-point passes and it became Wolverines' turn to put up a stout defence.

This the Michigan squad did so well that neither team was able to score by half-time. At the start of the second half, Blues found some extra confidence and for the first 10 minutes Wolverines could not move out of their own half. Fine play by the Michigan captain, Mirceau Oprea, steadied the home team and they began to surge back.

Play swung from end to end of the field but it seemed that the defences of both teams were just too good. Once again the Blues' forwards were well supplied with passes from the inside men and finally after 15 minutes of the second half Blues took the lead.

Blues' left Stew Bell chased a long pass into the Michigan penalty area and, finding himself unable to get a clear shot at the goal he pushed the ball back to Bruno Bertolin who was hovering around the edge of the area. Bertolin took the pass on the run and drove a bullet screen-shot into the corner of the net.

Minutes later, Varsity increased its lead on a goal scored by two of the Baby Blues who had been selected to make the trip with the Blues. Doug Taylor, now playing leftwing, crossed a high ball into the Michigan goal-mouth and speedy Lloyd McKenzie out-jumped the entire defence to head the ball out of the reach of the goalkeeper into the net.

For the last ten minutes of the game, Wolverines placed all their strength in the attack and Baby Blues' Oskar Reinmann joined the Varsity defence to help preserve the lead which they managed to do until the final whistle.

It would be unfair to pick any stars on the Toronto team because they had to come up with a real team effort to defeat the very good Michigan squad. However, there is no doubt that if Vello Soots had not put on a spectacular performance at the beginning of the game, there may well have been a different story to tell.

This game marks the end of the season for Blues and the probable end of the Varsity career of captain Ron Williams. Williams has played for six years for Blues, each season on an Intercollegiate championship team. There is going to be a big hole to fill next year at centre half.

Blues final record for the year was seven wins, one tie and one defeat. During the season they scored 37 goals while conceding six.

Hockey Rules Altered To International Plan

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

When Varsity Hockey Blues complete what we hope is a triumphant two-day tour through Quebec, and have two victories against Laval and McGill comfortably salted away, they return to the Arena for the banner opener at home against University of Michigan Wolverines.

For some hockey enthusiasts, who come out to enjoy the color and thrills of college hockey, plus the cheerleaders and band present to honor Red Stephen, nothing will seem out of order.

To the serious student of the ice-game, however, who wants to know the why and wherefore of the law laid down by the boys in stripes, something may seem seriously amiss.

To all Varsity hockey fans we offer explanation. We quote.

"It was agreed at the annual meeting of the Board of Governors of the O.-Q.A.A., March 25, 1958, to adopt International Hockey Rules."

The International rules, adopted by hockey gamblers at the Olympics, by amateur leagues in Europe, and the Russians, differ from our own CAHA rules in about four points of major importance.

1. Body-checking is allowed only behind the red-line by defending players, but the offensive team may "ride off" their opponents.

2. "Icing the Puck" rule remains unchanged except for—Note: This rule applies whether the teams are numerically equal or not.

3. For a minor penalty, any player except a goal-keeper shall be ruled off for two minutes actual playing time, during which time no subs shall be permitted even though a goal be scored by the opposing team.

4. For fighting, slugging with fists (??) or sticks, kicking or attempting to do so, a player shall be awarded a match penalty, and disqualified for the remainder of the match. No substitution shall be allowed on the ice for five minutes.

That, in a nutshell, is how the rules have been changed for the coming Intercollegiate schedule. Whether these changes will make much difference to the Blues is not easy to say.

If Varsity continue to play the spectacular hockey they are so capable of, and just score more goals per game than their opponents, a few rule changes won't matter much to a hockey fan.

stition shall be allowed on the ice for five minutes.

From past to future in Badminton, there will be an Interfaculty singles competition from which players will be chosen for the Intercollegiate team. This singles tournament will be played just before the Christmas holidays.

Switching from birdies to balls and from nets to baskets, we see the Interfaculty basketball season nearing its end. With only one week left for regularly-scheduled games, the league leaders are preparing for the play-offs, which will be played the first week in December.

As things stand now, the top teams in each of the six leagues are: PHE III, PHE II, OCE, PHE I, Victoria Freshies and P&OT Freshies. Each of these teams is undefeated in regular season play, and we can look forward to an exciting play-off.

In contrast to the Interfaculty basketball which is just ending, there is the Intercollegiate which is just starting. There will be both a senior and an intermediate team this year. Mary Barnett and Kathy Kennedy will coach and manage respectively the senior team, and Mary Foster will coach the intermediates.

Both teams will travel to McMaster and London during the season. The senior team's trip to London will be to participate in the Intercollegiate basketball tournament, played the weekend of February 28.

The intermediate team, besides playing in some games against the other universities, will also play in a regular league composed of teams from YWCA, YWHA, and Macedonia Girls Club.

With these many things in store for the Intercollegiate

That tall, bespectacled gentleman you may have noticed on visits to the Students' Administrative Council building is not what you would expect him to be.

You would likely mistake him for a graduate renowing old acquaintances at his alma mater rather than a polished and conscientious male version of the drum majorette.

His name is Murray Dresser, and he's one of those unsung heroes, one of the many people who played an important role in the drama that brought the Yates Cup back to Toronto.

His special charge is the Blue and White Band, regarded by expert observers as one of the finest this university has produced in over a decade, and certainly the most accomplished in the past four semesters.

Murray Dresser has had some happy moments in this his final year as director of the band. The Remembrance Day service, when his musicians were lauded by many for a fine performance; that happy day in London when touchdowns came like machine-gun bullets; the Homecoming Show when hundreds of graduates stood and sang The Blue and White for the first time in many years.

Mention The Blue and White to Murray, and he'll tell you this year's band probably played it more than any corps in Varsity history.

"It was all those touchdowns," he grins. "What with rehearsals and other functions besides football, I'd say we've played it pretty close to 200 times."

And although football is over, there are more to come. An organization rehearsal for the hockey season is scheduled for Thursday of this week at 5 p.m. in the Drill Hall. New members are welcome, and if you need second term P.T. credits, here's the chance.

Time is short, too, with the Band's initial winter appearance carded for Monday night, when Varsity Blues and University of Michigan Wolverines tangle in exhibition hockey, and Dave Stephen is accorded the honor due him.

Moving from the football field to the hockey rink signals a significant change in task for Murray, and for Carole Marshall, our very pretty and very eye-catching drum majorette. No longer necessary are the intricate and involved marching formations, which were changed each week during the grid season.

Despite, however, the change from strutting to sitting, the music will be the same. Come Monday night, and the Gillette Cavalcade of Sports is in the air once again.

(Murray grins over the hurried change necessary in his band's pre-game program when Western visited October 11. The Mustang band completed its show with the Look Sharp March, the very piece of music Varsity's group planned to open with).

Yes, with a hard-working leader, 36 accomplished musicians and a talented majorette, the Blue and White Band can well be proud of its 1958 achievement.

We're all proud to stand at attention and sing our university song. It's even a greater thrill for Murray Dresser to lead it.

On Monday night, let's support the Blues, and let's show the band how much we appreciate its contribution.

The roof, may it rise.

In a round robin badminton tournament, Joy Mahood, I PHE, and Dorothy Ewing emerged tied for first place with 75 points each.

The final scores were arrived at by totalling the individual scores of the four sets in which each girl participated.

With a relatively good turnout, the competition, which was well organized, went along quickly and smoothly. From comments heard in the Drill Hall throughout the evening, the tournament can be judged as very successful.

From past to future in Badminton, there will be an Interfaculty singles competition from which players will be chosen for the Intercollegiate team. This singles tournament will be played just before the Christmas holidays.

Switching from birdies to balls and from nets to baskets, we see the Interfaculty basketball season nearing its end. With only one week left for regularly-scheduled games, the league leaders are preparing for the play-offs, which will be played the first week in December.

As things stand now, the top teams in each of the six leagues are: PHE III, PHE II, OCE, PHE I, Victoria Freshies and P&OT Freshies. Each of these teams is undefeated in regular season play, and we can look forward to an exciting play-off.

In contrast to the Interfaculty basketball which is just ending, there is the Intercollegiate which is just starting. There will be both a senior and an intermediate team this year. Mary Barnett and Kathy Kennedy will coach and manage respectively the senior team, and Mary Foster will coach the intermediates.

Both teams will travel to McMaster and London during the season. The senior team's trip to London will be to participate in the Intercollegiate basketball tournament, played the weekend of February 28.

The intermediate team, besides playing in some games against the other universities, will also play in a regular league composed of teams from YWCA, YWHA, and Macedonia Girls Club.

With these many things in store for the Intercollegiate teams, it appears as if the girls will be kept quite busy.

Keeping up to the travels of the basketball team is the Intercollegiate swim team, which travelled to Rochester last weekend.

A small team, composed of synchronized swimmers Linda Krillsa, Liz Bell and Anne Ferguson, speed swimmer Val Lewis, and divers Steph Haas and acting-captain Jane Furness, placed second with 45 points, only three points behind Brockport State Teachers' College.

U of T placed first in three out of four strokes, the only three speed events entered, and in a "treasure hunt". We hear the hospitality was great, and a good time was had by all.

Good luck to the swim team in the Intercollegiate meet this coming weekend at Queen's, and congratulations to Janet Medland, newly-elected captain of the team.

Seeks A Social Successor

The Varsity Blues Band's comely honey-blond baton-twirler graduates this year and she's looking for a replacement.

Carole Marshall, who this year is in the third year of the Physical and Occupational Therapy course has held the position for the past two football seasons. The outgoing majorette has some advice for prospective twirlers—whether expert or just interested.

There are pre-game parades, half-time shows, pep rallies, and perhaps even a small part on television waiting for the girl who is chosen, Miss Marshall says.

"If you have to lead the band through a sea of practising players, that isn't so bad, because isn't it the secret dream of every girl to be surrounded by college football players?" she asks.

Practices will be held Tuesday and Thursday at the Varsity Stadium dressing rooms. Time is 5:30 p.m.

Miss Marshall will make the final selection. The 1959 majorette should like people, and "be willing to be kidnapped by thieving Queen's Engineers," she says.

St. Laurent In Winnipeg Met With Fish, Insults

WINNIPEG (CUP) — A very dead fish and assorted banana peels flew through the air here last week towards the head of former Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent.

Students crowded into the University of Manitoba student council union were shocked by the actions of U of M engineers at the back of the hall.

Protests against the fish-and-bananas came close to a riot—until the visiting dignitary revealed his true identity.

He was not St. Laurent, but an engineer disguised in a black homberg and walking stick.

The engineers had notified the campus and local radio stations of the impending visit of the former prime minister. Crowds of U of M students were taken in by the prank until the supposed retired politician revealed an engineering hockey sweater beneath his overcoat.

THIS CHARMING Japanese lady was one of many overseas students appearing in native costume at Treasure Van's International Night last night. The giant sale took in a record $700 in its first afternoon of operations yesterday. Many university, government and diplomatic representatives attended the Van's official opening yesterday afternoon in the basement of Howard Ferguson Hall.

Open Doors On Treasure Trove

Treasure Van officially opened its doors in Howard Ferguson Hall, yesterday and netted a record $700 in first afternoon sales.

Gordon Duffin, Ontario Assistant Supervisor for Elementary Education, performing the ceremony, said "many students around the world would be helped by purchases made today."

Earlier Hart House Warden Joseph McCulley described Mrs. Ethel Mulvaney, Treasure Van organizer, "the heart, the soul and the driving force behind the organization."

Warden McCulley traced a short history of World University Service of Canada.

Also present at the opening were President Claude Bissell and Chancellor Samuel Beatty.

$90,000 For OCE Talent Study Granted

U of T President Claude T. Bissell yesterday announced a $90,000 grant from the Carnegie Corporation for a five-year study of high-school students.

The grant is expected to cover costs for the first two years of a study of identification and utilization of talent in high school and college. Total cost of the plan is estimated at $750,000.

The study will be directed by Prof. R. W. B. Jackson, director of the Department of Educational Research at the Ontario College of Education, Pres. Bissell said.

Prof. Jackson last night called the proposed study "the biggest we've ever tackled". Its proportions exceed those of any study of its kind ever conducted in Canada, he said.

Scheduled to begin in September, the study will interview Grade 9 students in all Ontario's high schools, and follow them through five years of schooling. The study - will attempt to evaluate:

- the abilities and personal characteristics associated with success and failure in high schools, various occupations, and institutions of higher learning.

- the proportion of able students who do not receive education to the limit of their ability, and the resultant loss to Canadian society as well as to the individuals concerned.

- reasons why students with marked intellectual ability leave high school before completing their courses.

- means for overcoming barriers to higher education for those able to profit by it, especially financial barriers.

- methods for better evaluating abilities and personal characteristics.

- needs for reorganization of high school programs and university entrance requirements.

Scott (Trin); Lucia, Pat Coulton (Vic); Cassandra, Sandra Stephenson (Trin); John, Michael Davidson (UC); Marcus, Ian Garrett (Cons).

"Everyone who's been picked for the cast is amazingly suited to their role—it's almost type-casting," producer Bill Lord said last night.

Additional auditions to fill four available parts in the male chorus have been scheduled for 3.30-5.30 p.m. in the Women's Union theatre Wednesday, Lord said. At least four dancers will be chosen, he said.

Cast Nearly Completed, "Have Toga" Travelling

All-Varsity Revue officials have found a lead for their "Have Toga, Will Travel" — but they have to start looking for a new assistant producer.

Neil McLean (OCE) will have to abdicate his position on the production staff to play Nero in the original musical comedy.

Other leads in the cast list released last night include: Portia, Diane Ede (Trin.); Primus, Deane Hutchinson (Vic); Secundus, Joe Starr (Meds); Tertius, Sheldon Greenberg (UC); Quartus, Gerry Dawson (Vic); Quintus, Roger White (Meds); Julia, Ruth Ann

220 Student Ballots Show Resounding "No" For Plan

Students participating in a Varsity straw poll yesterday turned thumbs down on a proposed plan to provide free education to first-class university students and lengthen the university academic year.

The proposal was contained in an unofficial report released last week by the U of T President's advisory committee on student aid chaired by vice-president Murray Ross.

Of 220 students filling in a ballot printed in yesterday's Varsity, 103 said they disapproved of the plan's overall aim and 37 said they had serious reservations.

Virtually none of the students filling out the ballots expressed disapproval of facets of the plan other than the proposed lengthening of the school year and the cutting-off of aid to third-class and, to some extent, second class students.

Arts students, however, approved the plan's aim 34-19 with nine having doubts while professional students voted 14-9 for the plan with four maybes.

By far the greatest response to The Varsity's request for opinions came from the Engineers who handed in 131 ballots and swung the vote on the plan's aim to the no-side.

All three groups agreed they wouldn't like to attend the U of T if the plan were put into effect.

Twenty wrote they would be unable to attend, although the question did not appear on the ballot.

By far the greatest objection to the plan was the proposed shortened summer vacations, to which 165 students objected. The majority of the objections were for financial reasons, although some cited the experience gained from summer employment.

Eighty students objected to the lack of aid to third and second-class students.

A number of students expressed disapproval of the idea of hiking university fees. This provision was not included in the report but has been recommended by U of T president Claude T. Bissell.

The three groups of students were unanimous in objecting to lengthened vacations over a lack of aid to lower-class students.

News Snaps

Jargon editors appointed

●A faculty editorial board and a deadline for the Jargon, new all-campus literary magazine, were announced last night by Jargon editor John Robert Columbo.

Faculty editors are UC English Professor Hugo McPherson, Victoria Don and lecturer Jay Macpherson and Trinity Assistant English Professor Milton Wilson. Deadline for the magazine, which appears in March, is Feb. 1. Contributions from any faculty are welcome and will be paid for if quality material, Columbo said.

Columbo will be assisted by a student staff of Liz Binks (IV Trin.) and Susie Breslin (II SMC).

Student leaders meet

●Eleven U of T college and faculty heads meeting with Students' Administrative Council president Vince Kelly, last night informally approved of the idea of one unified all-campus charity drive.

The student heads also kicked around the idea of an all-campus students' union. University College president Bill Davis said he would support one only on condition it did not jeopardize the existence of separate college and faculty facilities.

Crated pledge

●A strange animal in a large wooden crate made a brief appearance on the front lawn of 91 St. George St. yesterday.

It was a Delta Tau Delta pledge, Fred Thompson (I UC). As Pledge Disciplinary Bruce Doidge (II Vic), and Bill Danyluk (III Pharmacy) explained, "This was for the benefit of the house. He didn't light our cigarettes on time and he back talked."

Dents cup snatched

●U of T dentists are looking for a cup and a cup snatcher. The cup, symbolizing a football trophy, is the star attraction in a parade next week advertising Dentanties' pigskin parody, "The Gay (up)". It disappeared from Dentanties producer Marc Legault's car while he was supervising rehearsals for the show Monday night.

Pearson speaks

●Liberal leader Lester B. Pearson will speak on campus Thursday. He will address an open meeting of campus Liberals Thursday at 3 p.m. in Wymilwood Music Room.

Mr. Pearson is former External Affairs Minister and Canadian delegate to the United Nations.

Deep River Rally

●A monster rally sponsored by the Students' Action League For A Sane Sunday will be held today at the bandstand, Queen's Park, at 1.00 p.m.

Jim Karfils, young Board of Control candidate, will be speaking, and as an added feature, the "Deep River Boys", will be singing. Karfils' platform is aimed at revision of Toronto's "Blue Laws". Bring your own monster.

rebel with wrong cause

The formation recently of a campus group directed towards brightening Toronto's Sundays has that unmistakable aura of undergraduate idiocy surrounding it.

The immediate aim of the group is to mobilize mass student support for Toronto Board of Control candidate Jim Karfilis. The Karfilis platform contains many well-worn planks but its main buttress is the assumption that most of the electorate in this city want a "happier brighter Sunday".

We are not sure that they do.

Mr. Karfilis argues that the antiquated law forbidding Sunday performances of paid entertainments "discriminates against thousands of citizens who actively wish to enjoy these things on their only free day—Sunday".

Now this sacred city of ours, this urban illegitimate, wrought by Chaos against Reason and the hand of Sanity, has very few claims to fame.

But one of them is its precious Sunday. Men from the four corners of the world, men who know nothing else of Canada, can smile knowingly when the subject is mentioned.

More than this, Toronto's older inhabitants realize the tradition which has been fashioned. They understand it, and in away, secure a masochistic pleasure from the inconveniences involved.

They will talk, complain, swear and whimper about their Sunday, but most are too intelligent to attempt to change anything.

Now, with the aid of rebellious youth—most of whom cannot vote anyway—Mr. Karfilis would destroy the city's backbone and leave it almost devoid of any personality.

All that would remain would be Casa Loma and two of the most sensational newspapers in North America.

And the persons hardest hit by Mr. Karfilis' proposal are those who could do his campaign the most good.

What else will weary editorial writers have to talk about in their off nights?

Yugoslavia—VII

Freedom: what it means

By ELIZABETH HAMMANG

About ten years ago Elizabeth Hammang walked across the Yugoslavian border into Hungary and later into Austria and finally into freedom. She came to Canada about five years ago, knowing little English, and recently qualified for Canadian citizenship. Here is her interpretation of what the word "freedom" means—a word most of us abuse with mechanical consistency. This article concludes the series on Yugoslavia which grew out of the World University Service seminar there this summer.

The story I am about to tell is not one which describes a well planned vacation in the beautiful Alps or on the azure blue Adriatic but only an Easter weekend a few miles from Vienna.

I lived at the time in Vienna but all its beauty, charm and enchantment could not still the longing for my own homeland; many times I went to the Danube to send greetings with the flowing waters to the vast plain of Panonia, which I loved so dearly. As time went on I made wonderful friends, friends who knew about my feelings and wanted to help and I shall never forget the kind invitation for that Easter weekend.

We reached our destination late in the evening by train and I had no idea that we had come to a very small but beautiful valley surrounded by mountains, which I did not know and did not love.

I had never climbed before and my friends had to wait more than once, but somehow they did not seem to mind because they knew if my rendezvous with nature should be successful they would have to give me time.

How I enjoyed those moments when the shadows lifted and the first streak of light fell through the sky, when slowly and tenderly the first sunlight brushed over the tops of the tallest trees and when the clang of the bells from the valley below rose through the heights to remind all living of the sublime moment two thousand years ago.

Slowly we climbed up the mountain side and within my heart I felt a strange and new love. I began to realize that one must not necessarily be untrue to his own lost land to appreciate nature's wonders so different in their manifestations and when we reached the top and my eyes followed the snowy clouds sailing across the blue sky I felt once again that wonderful feeling of freedom, which I had missed so much. I closed my eyes and saw myself walking through the yellow fields of our plain, the wandering breeze playing with its heavy ears—I saw the sun go down, great, purple and beautiful but it did not hurt any more. I suddenly realized that the freedom I was seeking lay not in the plains or mountains of the country but with the people and the rights they stand for and I felt contented with my fate.

A few days ago when I stood in front of the judge to swear before God to fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen I saw myself standing on the top of that mountain, smiling to the sailing clouds and thinking "AT LAST I AM HOME AGAIN."

MULOCK FINAL TODAY

Offence Key To Game

Vic Slight Favourites

Victoria are favoured to win the Mulock Cup today when they play Sr. Skule at the Bloor St. bowl at 1 p.m.

Despite their great performance in upsetting Trinity last Thursday, it is reasoned that they don't have the depth to beat Vic.

Nevertheless, Skule will be up for the game and an upset would surprise only Vic. They key to the game appears to be the Vic offence.

It has sputtered on and off all season, showing only occasional flashes of its true powers in each game. If it rolls early, Skule will be hard pressed to stay within two touchdowns of the Scarlet and Gold.

Vic's best chance for a quick break up of the ball game is the long pass. The Engineer defence is somewhat leaky as almost everybody has passed against them all year.

Trinity, while losing 14-13 in the semi still got both their TDs through the air.

Vic have a good passer in Paul Sapuntjis, and a host of good receivers. Grant Bull is foremost among these. He broke up a ball game against the Engineers earlier this year when in the last minutes of play he took a long one from Sapuntjis and went 84 yards for the only score of the game.

In addition, Vic has a flock of good backfielders. Ken Myers, Mike Smith and Don Seebach lead the running attack.

Vic should also have a big edge in the punting. Duane Wills has outkicked 90% of his rivals this year and if the field is muddy, he could be a big factor in the end result.

This of course is leaving out the trade mark of all Vic teams, their defence. As usual it is strong and tough. Every game it has held the opposition in check until the offence started to roll.

On the other side of line will be Skule. They stand between Vic and the coveted silverware.

Upset winners over Trinity, they showed they have the spirit and the drive to go all the way.

Still, they lack the offence (running) to move the big Vic line. Their fine quarterback Derek Lunn can pass, but he has not been consistent.

The man to watch will be Nestor Sniura. If Skule are to win, he will be a big factor on the offence.

Hockey Blues To Meet World Champion Dunnies In Dec. 17 Game Here

The University of Toronto Athletic Directorate last night approved a proposal to bring the world champion Whitby Dunlops to Varsity Arena December 17 for an exhibition game with Varsity Blues.

Blues' coach Jack Kennedy had written W 'by general manager Wren Blair last week in effort to arrange the exhibition tilt, and Blair told Kennedy Monday that Dunnies would be willing to play on the above date.

Sanction from the Directorate was needed because Whitby had asked for a minimum guarantee for the game. It was decided the financial figure could be met, and the vote for the game was unanimous.

The battle should provide the answer to a key question in the future of the 1958 Blues, who have been suggested as possible Canadian representatives for the Winter Olympic Games in Squaw Valley, California in 1960.

Dunnies, who last year were undefeated in returning the world hockey title to Canada, appear as powerful this season as they were last. Not including last night's game with Ottawa-Hull Canadiens, they lead the Ontario Hockey Association Senior A Eastern Division by six points, with 11 wins in 14 games.

Special student price for the game will be fifty cents, while reserved seat tickets will be $2.50, $1.50 and $1.00. Information regarding ticket sale will be carried in The Varsity.

Robbery Yields $1,300 As Heavy Safe Hauled

THE VARSITY

Vol. LXXVIII—No. 43

Thursday, November 27th, 1958

By AL WALKER
Varsity Staff Reporter

An estimated $1,300 in cash and cheques contained in a steel safe was stolen from the Engineering Society office early yesterday morning.

Detective Robert Brown of the Metropolitan Police Dept. said "the safe was pushed out the window and carried away—probably on a truck."

The theft was discovered by the night-watch man on his round at 5 a.m. Three windows of the ground-floor office were broken and there was evidence a ladder had been used.

The window-sills are about 15 feet above ground level. A foot-deep hole was left under the windows by the safe's fall.

Also in the safe were various financial records and the complete books of the Society.

Fingerprints found on the remaining panes of glass were compared with those of the members of the Society's executive but revealed nothing, police said.

Society treasurer Frank Collins said last night insurance should cover the financial loss, but the books are not replaceable.

"The store is our main source of revenue, and our financial dealings are extensive," he said. The loss of the books is a great blow to us."

Society president Rick Schaeff said that "from all appearance the theft looks like an off-campus job".

Detective Brown said he doubted the theft was a prank. "If it was, it was a pretty stupid one, because they left themselves open to charges of breaking and entering. We are treating this as a regular break-in," he said.

Earlier reports from an Engineering Society employee that a crane had been used to remove the safe were termed "ridiculous" by Detective Brown.

Collins said the safe weighs about 250 pounds and "two men could carry it without much trouble."

Students, Faculty Protest at United

WINNIPEG — CUP — Three United College professors have threatened to resign and students are planning to boycott lectures unless the college rehires Prof. Harry Crowe.

About 300 students formed picket lines despite snow yesterday to protest the alleged "injustice" done Crowe in his Sept. 15 dismissal.

The students held off a planned boycott of lectures yesterday in favor of a meeting of a student delegation with college administration officials today.

Threats of resignation have come from Dr. J. H. Reid, chairman of the history department; Dr. K. W. K. McNaught, associate professor of history; and Dr. R. M. Stingle, associate professor of English.

The three threaten to quit their posts if Crowe is not reinstated by the college as was recommended in a report of the Canadian Association of University Teachers released Tuesday.

Crowe was fired from the small affiliate of the University of Manitoba following the interception of a personal letter from himself to a fellow faculty member by college principal Dr. W. H. Lockhart.

The picketing students called Crowe "a victim of injustice" and "wholeheartedly" accepted the report of the CAUT committee.

Van Totals Show Sign Of Record

World University Service should be able to count on a record-breaking Toronto contribution this year.

Receipts from Treasure Van have already smashed last year's records. Yesterday's Van receipts were $1,466 compared to $1,113 last year. Receipts Tuesday were double last year's and the total receipts so far is already approaching last year's grand total of $4,841.

WUS chairman Sue Evans told the Students' Administrative Council last night prospects look good for the upcoming SHARE campaign.

Hillel has promised to raise funds for a special WUS Israel project, she said.

For relaxation he vacations in Cape Breton, plays tennis, walks and composes limmericks.

Bissell Discusses Tuition Plan Tells TV Audience Of Opposition

The student subsidy plan for Ontario universities is not yet final but should take shape eventually in a revised form, U of T President Claude Bissell said last night.

Speaking to a cross-Canada audience on CBC "Tabloid," Dr. Bissell discussed the new tuition plan, his own undergraduate days and his prowess as an amateur poet in a half-hour program devoted entirely to him.

"In its present form the plan is not an immediate blueprint," the president said. "Many facets of it will have to be revised".

He said the proposal to shorten the vacation year has come under fire from several faculty members who feel two months is not adequate time for research.

Dr. Bissell said financial aid from federal and provincial sources had become essential.

"Endowments for financial support are no longer possible," he said. "Assistance must come from federal and provincial grants."

Dr. Bissell added he dislikes the term "free education" because it implies cheap education.

His work as university president keeps him busy from 8 a.m. until nearly midnight, he said.

Questioned about the existing Ontario examination system, he said the present method is the best that has been worked out although it has come under attack from various circles.

The greatest danger from the increased number of students entering universities is not so much expansion as distortion of emphasis in academic life, Dr. Bissell said.

The president described himself as "that horrible thing, the all-round student" when speaking of his undergraduate years at U of T. "My family was hit by the depression and I went through university on scholarships", he said.

An honor English student and later an English professor, he admitted he has never managed to like mathematics.

a "prestige affair" ...

Big Banquet Maybe

Plans for the initiation of an elaborate honorary graduation banquet were laid before the Students' Administrative Council last night and approved in principle.

Calling the proposed dinner "a prestige affair", Blue and White chairman Dave Pinkham said every segment of the campus would be represented.

It would be important enough to attract prominent speakers, he said. SAC honor awards would be presented at the banquet instead of at the graduation tea.

Pinkham said the banquet as it is presently conceived could be best compared to President Claude Bissell's inauguration breakfast. Representatives of all student faculties and colleges, activities and organizations would be invited, as well as delegates from the university administration and staff, he said.

SAC president Vince Kelly said the banquet would be a means for the university to "pay tribute to its parts," and would not be a strictly graduate affair.

Called "the U of T dinner", the banquet would probably be arranged for the first week in March, Pinkham said. Mechanics of the dinner, including finances, would have to be investigated before the SAC made any decision on it, he said.

A motion by Kelly approving the idea in principle was passed by the council. The motion authorized the Blue and White committee to investigate details, Pinkham said.

Forty Face Freezing Wind To Hear Blue-laws Blasted

A campaign rally to protest Toronto "Blue Laws" held yesterday in Queen's Park slowly picked up momentum and raced full speed to a dead stop.

"Bad weather conditions," were blamed for knocking most of the punch out of the previously advertised "monster rally".

Less than 40 students showed up to support Jim "Brighter Sunday" Karfilis, young board of control candidate in his efforts to spark off public opinion against the lack of amusements on the Sabbath.

The scheduled hour-long demonstration lasted only fifteen minutes. Campaign manager Bill Wood blamed "cloudy skies and biting winds" for poor student turnout.

A truck with a loudspeaker was set up in front of the bandshell. The Deep River Boys, a Toronto quartet, bounced out different musical selections for the shivering crowd of listeners.

A chilled drum majorette went through her paces, dancing in and out between sparse groups of 2 and 3 students.

Mr. Karfilis, commenting on the students participation said "this was the 'most spontaneous reaction his platform had received to date'".

"The students gathered here are indicative of the fact the university is behind my plan," he added.

He felt U of T students are playing a vital and important role in "awakening the people of Toronto against its insane Sunday laws."

Various signs carried by the U of T Students Action League for A Sane Sunday who sponsored the rally read "I spent a month in Toronto last Sunday", and "I've Got the Blue Law Blues".

Wood felt the "miserable showing" didn't indicate popular university feeling. He said he received many phone calls from students last night who want to come to a similar rally being held in the Players Hall tonight.

Karfilis, who spoke about three minutes, told students "open theatres, concerts and other amusements of a brighter Sunday won't lead men to the roots of evil." Thousands of tourists are lost every year because Toronto "fails to appreciate a more liberal law for Sundays."

Other Universities: Support Toronto Scheme, Carleton Chief Uncertain

MONTREAL — CUP — A. Davidson Dunton, President of Ottawa's Carleton University, has called the U of T student aid plan "a step in the right direction" — but feels the plan falls short in many respects.

The plan, announced last Wednesday by U of T President Claude T. Bissell, guarantees free education to first-class students and limited aid to second-class students.

"There are not too many people with first-class honors and second-class-honors students must still worry about money," Dr. Dunton said.

He said he was "sorry that the idea was brought up at this time."

Another aspect criticized by Dr. Dunton was the shortness of summer vacations for students — two months were stipulated in the plan with four weeks off at Christmas and Easter.

In general, faculty members lack time for research, Dr. Dunton said. "I am not too sure about the academic year."

Dr. Dunton also criticized the proposed use of senior matriculation results as a guide for aid.

"Senior matriculation results are a poor indication of who should and who should not go to university. What we need is a system to decide who should go to university and then help them."

The dividing line between aid and no-aid should not be so rigid, Dr. Dunton said. "I am not prepared to cut off financial assistance for those students who are not quite second class."

Other Canadian university authorities have expressed varying reactions to the plan.

McMaster President G. P. Gilmore said the plan has "great promise". "Our academic year is now much too crowded," he said.

McGill vice-president D. L. Thomson said, "I envy the University of Toronto." Changes in the McGill academic year have been considered, he said, but "nothing has been decided."

Ronald Allan, Western vice-president, asked for time to consider the "more radical changes."

Financial aid to first-class students would be "a wonderful thing," he said.

Hugh H. Sanderson, University of Manitoba President said the proposed changes in the school year would bring it "more in line with the English pattern."

Assistance to first-class students is "something we all want," he said.

Acting president of the University of British Columbia said, "Ability to pay for the plan is the only question. We need these first-class students as researchers and scholars."

and Doug Pepplatt (II Trin) to the opposition committee.

Pepplatt, who is understood to have been the motivating force behind the overthrow attempt, resigned from the government earlier this week because of disagreement with its policy.

Kelly Before Camera Explains Poll Result

Television came to Students' Administrative Council President Vince Kelly last night and he survived.

Kelly appeared on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's Metropolitan Newscast at 8 p.m. He answered questions concerning student reaction to the new aid plan.

How About A Date?

Ewe Ghee Go does exist.

Tuesday, an ad appeared in The Varsity calling attention to the fact that Ewe Ghee Go, a handsome Romeo, fresh from the continent, was the latest addition to Meds 6T4.

Interested girls were informed he could be reached at North House, Devonshire House.

A female Varsity staffer phoned him, and was told Ewe Ghee Go was only an affectionate name for the speaker. She was asked if she would like a date.

Upon investigation, she found Ewe Ghee Go is a Malayan student, in first pre-meds, who knew nothing about the ad being placed in The Varsity.

His friends in North House, as yet unidentified, had placed the ad "to find him some girl friends."

Pearson On Campus

Liberal leader Lester B. Pearson talks to campus Liberals today in Wymilwood with what club officials term "a keynote speech" in preparation for their forthcoming model Parliament session.

Club members expect the national party leader to touch on the proposed CCF-CLC merger and next year's national debt in his 3 p.m. address today.

"We are especially interested in what Mr. Pearson may say about the CCF merger," he added. "Campus Liberals are revolted by the misleading and misleading appeals of socialist leaders with regard to this."

Kelly said he thought The Varsity's poll Wednesday on student opinion about the plan "was slanted towards those who were opposed."

He said only students who were strongly against the plan were aroused enough to register their vote.

"The proposal is a good first step," he said, "and I think most U of T students are generally in favor."

Kelly said the plan seemed aimed mainly at Arts students. It is flexible enough to allow Engineers who want four summer months for gaining practical experience to take a longer vacation if needed, he said.

Kelly praised the proposal for the incentive it gave third class students, and said students were proud U of T President Claude Bissell had brought it forward.

Fail To Dismiss Trinity Institute

An attempt to overthrow the Government Council of the Trinity College Literary Institute went down to a decisive defeat yesterday.

A motion of want of confidence in the government was defeated by a vote of 39 to seven.

The motion, moved by Pat Wooten (I Trin) charged the government with carelessness in the disappearance of a print of an Anagnon portrait of the Queen from the Junior Common Room.

Council leader Bob Langlois (IV Trin), refused to accept any responsibility for the disappearance of the $75 picture.

Wooten's motion also charged the government with poor publicity for debates, failure to provide a budget and "perverting the Constitution" and refusing to announce a policy which had not been agreed to by the opposition.

Langlois denied the government was guilty of any complicity in waiting for the agreement of the Opposition before announcing its policy.

Opposition leader Rich Wilson (III Trin) denied collaborating with the government.

Wilson immediately appointed the seconder of the motion of non-confidence, Robert Wilson (IV Trin), David Gray (II Trin)

salmaris

Along about five o'clock on any chilly winter afternoon, passers-by can see a rich black column of oily smoke curling slowly cloudwards from a point immediately north of Hoskin Avenue near Queen's Park.

The smoke rises for awhile and then, a toy of a million wind currents, twists downwards to roll across muddy paths and playing fields, to wrap itself round skeletons of trees and to seep through locked windows and bolted doors until its essence is everywhere.

Trinity is stoking up.

Trinity is many things—and some of them are good. But most of all it is independent—right down to its own heating system.

Most other buildings on this campus are heated by a central control. High pressure steam pipes, fed by a modern furnace with regulated smoke filters, weave an underground labyrinth throughout the university. Heating is efficient, quiet and clean.

But not in Trinity. Trinity has disdained the common trough, ignored the mutual benefits and steered her own uncomfortable and inefficient course.

At times she resembles nothing more than a great grey battleship, surging sulfuriously nowhere—a remnant of a once proud Atlantic fleet, somehow left stranded high, static and dry when the last waves of Imperialism receded and marooned her in the colonial mud.

The lesser breeds beneath the slime who have coughed, gagged and spat in the all-enveloping fog which billows in her wake will be glad to hear that Trinity has appointed a committee to investigate the matter.

Indications are the college will convert to the communal steam pipes in about six years time.

paene cum laude

Two front page stories in The Varsity yesterday, taken together, provide some insight into the eventual results of the new U of T tuition plan.

The first story contained the results of a campus poll in which a majority of students expressed some doubts about the new plan. Most even said they would not like to attend university under the plan.

The second story is about a $90,000 grant for a five-year study of high school students.

By itself the first story would be depressing. It suggests that the university will become more and more a haven for an intellectual elite, and that while many not now in the university will come in the future, many now here will not belong in the midst of that elite.

But the second story makes the prospect much more optimistic. For it suggests that steps may be taken to shift to the high schools the job that the university is divesting itself of; the job of providing higher education to the great mass of people in our society who do not and never will belong in an intellectual elite but can benefit from education all the same.

At least we hope the study of high schools will result in such proposals.

Because what will become of the high schools is now the most important question. With a change in high schools, the university tuition plan may be a dream come true; without basic re-orientation in high schools, it may be a disaster. SA

Look At England

Dear Sir:

Despite your correspondent's assertions that Dr. Bissell's plans will not work because of the new term periods proposed, I submit that they are not only feasible but also already exist substantially in the universities of Britain.

Admittedly, the system of financial aid is different; students are awarded grants by county and country governments, and it is the minority that do not receive aid to a lesser or greater degree. Nor is political influence found as attached strings; it is interesting to note that although the Labour Party speaks of abolishing private schools, it has no objections to Oxford and Cambridge et al. producing an intellectual group similar to that emerging from the private schools.

If the proposed timetable can operate elsewhere, surely there is no reason that it should not in Canada also, given some adjustment in thinking by all parties concerned. The alternative is two universities in each area, one working on the present timetable and the other on that proposed.

It should also be pointed out to Mr. Furgieule that to be a socialite is nowadays the norm, not an expression of angularity.

Dream, Study

Dear Sir:

I have just read your interesting but slightly confused article, A Third-Class Student Speaks. I agree with you in your worry over the place of the arts student in such a system. BUT, I do not agree with you about the third-class student.

I am perfectly willing to concede to the fact that some students, despite a conscientious and consistent application, get third-class honours. But the student who debates, writes, acts and participates in campus politics, and does it to the extent that he gets third-class honours, is a different matter. I would not consider him, under any circumstances as "this nation's spiritual future."

To do what you are supposed to do is not conformity. In my opinion, it is the sensible attitude of a mature student, and obviously not an easy ideal to follow. The theatre is important, as are politics, writing and debating, but not as an alternative to going to classes. You can dream dreams, produce art and study at the same time.

Inadequate diet, tuberculosis, and mental breakdown are not uncommon.

On graduation the competition for jobs is acute. Today only about half have employment on graduation. The picture would be serious indeed except that many take jobs below their degree of training and others are absorbed for a time by the family farm or business. Women graduates frequently return to the home. It is little wonder that extreme political philosophies have considerable appeal.

During the post-war occupation, almost every phase of Japanese life felt the hand of reform—the role of the Emperor, government, the armed services, the police, the judiciary, education, economic patterns; industrial relations, and, perhaps, most important, the role of women. Though the extent and direction of many of the changes have been altered since the restoration of sovereignty in 1951, it seems clear that the "New Japan" will continue to be very different from the Japan of 1941.

There are many serious political problems facing the Government. The questions of the northern islands occupied by Russia, of the prisoners of war still held in Russia, and of the presence of American treaty forces in Japan and Okinawa provide difficulties. The post-war constitution forbids a resort to armed force and war, but in the present world, Japan cannot remain dependent upon others for defence. Yet, throughout the country there is a widespread fear of the resurgence of militarism and police power. The Japanese want no part of war, especially a thermonuclear war, for they know its meaning. The desire on all levels of society for a peaceful world is a genuine one, at times almost fanatic in its intensity.

The Communist Party has had a checkered career. At one time it fomented serious riots but the present policy seems to be one of embarrassing the Government wherever possible without engaging directly in violence as a party. Careful advantage is taken of local grievances. Although relatively few in actual numbers, the Communists are well-organized and potentially have a large following among labour, intellectuals, teachers, and students, in particular.

The views of young Japanese on most questions largely reflect, though more vocally, those of the people in general. Everywhere one senses a striving to build a peaceful, respected, and more secure Japan. But agreement on the means to this end is far from unanimous. The young are jealous of their new-found freedom to think and to act, a reaction whose extreme forms are a source of concern to their parents. Only the future will tell how wisely this freedom is to be used.

But there is a deeper and more crucial problem in the lives of the youth of Japan. Defeat is never easy. It is especially devastating in effect for a people with a sense of mission. Whereas their parents can retain faith in the tenets of Buddhism and Shintoism, for many of the younger generation faith has become purely the observance of custom. As a standard for judgment and action it has been lost. Even the most hallowed principles and concepts have been subjected to scrutiny. The creed, "I believe in myself," is typical of many. At best it is a lonely belief. In times of crisis it brings scant comfort.

Into the vacuum in belief has poured a welter of ideas to compete for the allegiance of mind and heart. Materialism, communism, new synthetic religions, esoteric beliefs, existentialism, and Christianity are competing with counter-reformations within Shintoism and Buddhism. Christianity is a minority religion, though its ethical influence is wide. It is difficult to expect a Japanese to accept the totality of Christianity while much of the professed Christian world pays only lip service.

Thus, the world of the Japanese is an exciting and bewildering one but one that desperately seeks answers. What they are to be our challenge as well as that of Japan. If we have any concern for the well-being of others and if we value our future as a nation, we cannot be indifferent to the challenge.

"...a swanlike end, fading in music"

The key phrase underlying Shakespearean comedy is "What fools these mortals be." This theme is approached throughout the comedies with two constantly recurring and very different attitudes; cynical irony and deep compassion. Naturally two such basically opposed attitudes are difficult to integrate within one play, and Shakespeare almost never did. In the Merchant of Venice; for example, the two attitudes reach their point of greatest separation and run beside each other, each with a plot of its own, while in the Tempest the irony is almost completely submerged in the compassion.

In Twelfth Night, however, one of the three plays England's Old Vic Company is doing this week at the Alex, the irony and the compassion meet to form a unified whole.

This unity, however calls for extraordinary subtlety of production. The balance is delicate and direction that misses or prefers to miss the presence of both elements can upset it easily. In most productions an over-emphasis on compassion destroys the balance.

The Old Vic's production, on the other hand, was the rare case of a Twelfth Night in which the irony ruled to the almost utter exclusion of compassion.

The direction throughout took the play as simply a "debunking" of love. As such it is a very amusing experience. There is an endless display of originality in the invention of stage business, at its funniest when Malvolio's cross-garters are accidentally tied together. All the acting is pitched at the level of farce. Barbara Jefford as a coy Viola while Jane Downs' Olivia makes up in a scatter-brained "dumb-blonde" characterization what it lacks in Olivia's usual dignity. Because compassion is kept to a minimum Richard Wordsworth's Malvolio takes advantage of all the character's ridi-culousness but none of his poignancy. Mr. Wordsworth seems to have as much fun with Malvolio as the audience does. Joss Ackland, on the other hand, as Sir Toby Belch, is a bit forced in his gay mischievousness. John Neville, generally known for more serious things, is a wholly satisfying, very funny Andrew Aguecheek. And Dudley Pones as Feste, in keeping with the tone of the production is a fool with five-o'clock shadow, his gaiety under scored with a sad irony.

The set is impressive, especially in combination with some breathtaking lighting effects. The costumes, especially Malvolio's are almost the funniest things in the production.

After the wonderful farce is over there may be an uneasy feeling that something was missing. But even with the compassion lacking, the Old Vic's Twelfth Night is a sharp and very funny satire on love.

"Young Film" a film magazine dealing with the creative efforts of young actors, directors and technicians, and published by the Education, Culture and Travel Department of the International Union of students, in co-operation with Prague High School of Cinematography, is despite its Communist leanings, a very interesting and valuable book to have around the house. And if anyone wishes to subscribe to it, he can have it around the house.

In it, the reader may find articles by such famous personages as Albert Lamorisse, the director of the charming short film, Le Ballon Rouge, which give film enthusiasts valuable background information on the problems involved in all phases of film making. There are articles on little-known film producing companies, such as Iraq and Morocco. Or samples of amateur screenplays may be printed.

Not all the articles are of equally high calibre; the editors would be the first to admit this. But for information on what young people are doing in the cinematic world today, this book can't be beat. Yearly subscriptions are $3.00 for three issues; and may be obtained by writing to Young Film Subscriptions, Vozelova 3, Prague 2, Czechoslovakia.

We suggest you get your subscriptions in as soon as possible.

Two Plays, One Theme

Those who were lucky enough to see the Hart House Theatre production of Arthur Miller's Death Of A Salesman last month, may be interested to learn that the forthcoming production of the George Kaufman - John Marquand comedy hit, The Late George Apley, has essentially the same theme!

"Of course, there is a vast difference in the treatment of this theme," says Hart House Director Robert Gill; "one is a stark tragedy, while the other is a light comedy, and a Broadway type comedy at that. But both plays deal with youthful rebellion against parental lives."

"In Death, Biff manages to escape; in Apley, it is Elinor, the daughter. Another striking similarity is that in each play one of the children stays behind—in the Miller play it is Happy, and in the comedy it is John, the son."

Mr. Gill went on to say that this "parallelism" between contrasting dramatic forms was noticeable also in Lucky Sam McCarver and Dark Of The Moon (presented at Hart House two years ago). Both these plays deal with the inability of two people from conflicting environments to find happiness together. "One is a realistic drama, while the other is a pure fantasy," Mr. Gill said.

The curious similarity between the two productions this year illustrate a favourite thesis of Hart House's celebrated director, that all really good comedies have fundamentally a very serious theme. The only difference is in the treatment.

Whether you agree with this view or not, The Late George Apley, starting at Hart House this Saturday, should provide a most enjoyable evening. The play stars Gary Plaxton as Ashley, Molly Palmer as his wife, Joyce Ford as his sister, Vals Echin and Robert Graham as their daughter and son, and James Garraw and Dawn Egan,

"The same..."

Not bloody likely!

a meeting of the classics club

The local "classics club" met at Massey Hall this week for the third in the current series of regular subscription concerts by the TSO. The guest artist was a comparatively unknown Hungarian violinist, Johanna Martzy. Susskind conducted.

Business got off to a flying start with Wagner's overture to the Dutchman. In some sections we weren't sure whether this was "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" or not, since tempi tended to be moderate rather than contrasting, as we felt they could have been. There wasn't much beauty in the reading of lyrical passages; for example, the English-horn honked about like a lost goose. But there was plenty of power. The monstrous orchestra crashed and rolled like any good North Sea gale.

The soloist played Mendelssohn's E-minor Concerto. Although Miss Martzy's intonation tended to slip now and again, her tone was vibrant and vital. Her lyrical expression was a bit cursory, but there was much beauty in her playing.

Squeezed between these two giants, was Harry Somers' Passacaglia and Fugue. In the first section, the unwieldy bulk of the orchestra obscured much of the intricate detail of this purposeful work. But the fugue was well articulated, and we felt happy to have had another chance to hear this fascinating score.

After intermission we got right down to the purpose of the concert: Mahler's First Symphony. The performance of this thoroughly emotional work wasn't particularly inspired.

For example, the climax of the first movement fell flat on its face; we waited in keen anticipation (Mahler affects one that way), but the climax was dropped before the orchestra quite got to it. In the boisterously joyful second movement, there was little expression. Many opportunities for a slight rubato or stinging were bypassed unnoticed.

The third movement almost didn't start at all. Consequently the sarcastic satire inherent in Mahler's handling of "Frere Jacques" in the minor mode, didn't materialize. This whole movement is permeated with a sly, behind-the-hand smile, the performance sounded too much like a real funeral march to create the effect the composer was after.

The last movement was the best played. The violin solo and duet were graceful and beautiful. Mahler had the trick Tchaikowsky lacked: the ability to carry off a triumphant conclusion and make it sound right and true. After all these years of plugging by the best Mahler interpreters alive, Toronto is finally beginning to realize that Mahler is a worthwhile composer.

Vic Mulock Winners

Win 18th Championship With Skulemen Victims

By DAVE GRINER

Associate Sports Editor

Victoria College footballers swamped Senior Skule yesterday at Varsity Stadium 29-1 to win the Mulock Cup for the second time in the last four years.

The one-sided victory was the 18th time that Vic have captured the famed silverware in the 65 years that it has been up for competition.

Spirit and a stubborn defence best they could do was Lunn's were the keys to the Red and Gold's triumph. Every time SPS made a mistake the alert defence of their opponents was quick to take advantage of it.

Don Seebach, Jim Musselman, Bill Dauphinee, and Steve Moriarty scored the winners' touchdowns. Moriarty added two converts to the total while singles by Duane Wills (2) and Musselman completed the scoring.

Derek Lunn scored the losers' only point on a 31-yard single in the 3rd quarter.

Vic started right out as if they meant business. Lunn's first pass attempt was costly as a hard rush made him fumble the ball and Musselman dribbled it into the end zone where a Skuleman recovered to hold the loss to a single point.

Later in the quarter Wills kicked the first two of his two singles to up the Vic lead to 2-0. After an exchange of punts, Wills got behind the Skule secondary to take a long pass from quarterback Paul Sapuntjis and give Vic a first down on the SFS 18.

That was the end of the first quarter. From the 18, Seebach made four; Mike Smith got a first down on the five, and then Seebach drove over for the TD. Moriarty converted, 9-0.

Skule were held on two downs after the kickoff and on third down Rick Oaks broke through to block the attempted punt. The ball bounded into the end zone and Musselman fell on it for his team's second TD. The convert was wide.

Vic kept pressing and scored another point late in the half when Musselman recovered an Engineer fumble on the Skule 43. Vic got one first down and then Wills hoofed another single. The score remained 16-0 at the half.

Skule dominated most of the play in the third quarter. A recovered Vic fumble by Bob Sibthorp on the Red and Gold 24 gave the Engineers their best scoring chance in the game. A series of penalties against Victoria gave Skule no less than nine cracks from inside the 25, but the

That was Skule's only threat. Vic slowly and surely took control of the game from there. Another recovery of a Skule fumble by Musselman gave Vic the ball on the Engineers' 34. A series of plays took the ball to the four and Bill Dauphinee swept the end to put his team ahead 22-1. The convert was blocked.

Another fine defensive play set up the last Vic TD. Ken Myers intercepted a Skule pass on the SFS 40 - yard line. Sapuntjis passed to Jim Matthews for a first down on the nine, and two plays later Moriarty went over for the score. He converted to close out the scoring.

Vic's defence was magnificent as it held Skule to less than 100 yards on total offence for the game. John Hunter, Rick Oaks, and Bill Bell led the hard tackling Scarlet and Yellow team in their efforts to contain the running attack, while Musselman seemed to be hopping on the ball every time SPS fumbled.

The defensive backfield held the passing of Skule quarterbacks Lunn and Sam Clements to the pathetically low tally of four for 26. The net gain passing was 49 yards.

Offensively, the Vic team rolled for 160 yards on the ground and another 115 in the air. Vic completed nine of 19 passes.

Skule definitely lacked the spark that carried them to an upset victory over Trinity in the semi-final. This time it was Vic that was fired-up and this, combined with a big edge in line play, made the victory certain from the beginning.

The only department in which SPS had a definite edge was the down-field tackling.

Mike Smith was again the top ball carrier for the Victoria team. Ken Myers and Fred Kotani were the top operators on defence.

For the Engineers, the tackling of Clements, Bill Tyson and Sibthorp was the only bright spot in an otherwise dismal affair.

TOUCHDOWN— Victoria halfback Bill Dauphinee is all alone as he streaks into the end zone for Red and Gold's third touchdown in their 29-1 win over Senior Skule in the Mulock final in Varsity Stadium yesterday. Skule's Jack Egan (28) moves in too late.

Ice Blues Leave For Quebec Meet Laval, McGill Redmen

By GENE GLISKY

Associate Sports Editor

Tonight the Hockey Blues embark for points East. Scheduled to oppose Laval tomorrow and McGill on Saturday, Blues return to the Arena to meet University of Michigan Wolverines—or have you heard—on Monday.

No prediction on the outcome of these clashes is forthcoming. Finishing third and fourth respectively, in last year's campaign, Laval managed to defeat Blues once, while McGill turned the tables twice on Varsity.

Wolverines, according to all press reports, have a mighty fine club. Although riddled with injuries, and at the present time carrying only 11 regulars, they should present strong opposition. It is interesting to note, that out of a squad of 16, Wolverines boast 14 Canadian players.

A fair amount of speculation has arisen, concerning the chances of our Blues to represent Canada in the forthcoming winter Olympics. Whether the idea is sound, or even possible, remains to conjecture until Varsity have had the time, and what's more important, the opportunity to prove themselves.

No doubt the proposed match with Whitby Dunlops will help to dispel any doubts as to how good Blues really are.

One point remains unerringly clear, however. If it is real amateurs the Olympics require, then we shall unhesitatingly say, Varsity Blues are the finest truly amateur team in Canada.

There's small use denying, that in both Senior and Junior A clubs in Canada, amateur though they may be in name, the players derive a goodly portion of their cash from the ice game. There are very few, if any, hockey players in this country of the Blues' caliber, who devote 10 to 15 hours a week to the game, for a non-existent pecuniary reward.

Add to the financial and psychological cares that go hand-in-hand with a college education, the rugged knocks absorbed by a hockey player, and you need a pretty special kind of man to take it.

Our Blues are pretty special. They play the game with the verve and drive sometimes never encountered in professional ranks. They are the finest of truly amateur sportsmen.

THE THING

Hear Ye! Hear Ye! Step right up and see the greatest, the most sensational creature of its kind in the memory of man.

It moves. It slides and snorts, it rumbles, it turns. It picks it up and chews it up and spits it out again in one fluid, slippery motion. Captured in the hinterlands of coastal California, this colossal colossus was trekked through the concrete jungles of America, primarily for the Varsity fan's listening and viewing pleasure.

For this special occasion it changed its colors (through the marvelous works of nature) to blue and white. This greatest mobile miracle on ball bearings will perform for you and the little lady, free. Not an extra red cent will it cost you.

Come see the Zamboni in glorious color, in the Varsity Arena, at Dave Stephens Night, Monday Dec. 1, at 8 p.m.

INTERCEPTION

Victoria's Ken Myers moves in front of SPS Marino Basadur (50) to intercept a pass from Derek Lunn. Two other Vic players, including Steve Moriarty (92) move in to make sure.

If we can get the Sports Editor down off that cloud he's been riding about on for two weeks, there will be an important staff meeting in the office Friday at 1:15 p.m. Refreshments of a suitable nature will be provided for all staffers and potential reporters who bring their own grub.

There are several important items to be discussed, including a Christmas party, an Easter party, a birthday party, a political party, a wedding party, an art party, and of course, the coverage of sports on this campus.

Blues Take On YMHA Quintet In Cage Play

By MIKE CHYKALIUK

The senior Blues basketball team won their first exhibition game last Friday, defeating Andy's Athletic Club, 71-63.

Norm Mencil and Jim McGuire topped Blues' scorers with 10 and 12 points respectively.

Richters was Andy's whole show as he potted 23 points.

The game was well played, considering the infancy of the current campaign.

Tonight at 7, Blues take on the YMHA quintet at the Spadina Avenue Gymnasium in exhibition game number two.

Stiffer opposition is expected as the YMHA team is currently leading the Toronto Senior Men's League.

Line-ups: Toronto, Spilac, 8; Lipke, 5; Norman, 2; Potter, 4; Russell, 4; Patterson, 1; Mencil, 10; Ecclestone, 6; Goldring, 9; McGuire, 12; Mandel, 6; Nigrini, 0; McKechnie, 2; Muir, 2. Total—71.

Will Elect Fourth New Gov't. Wycliffe To Polls Again Today

By ED ROBERTS
Varsity Staff Reporter

Students of Wycliffe College will go to the polls tomorrow afternoon in an attempt to solve the College's current government difficulties

The new government will be formed by one of the two new parties which have been formed in the past two weeks, following the dissolution of the House by Governor-General Charles Ledger earlier this month.

Ledger ordered the dissolution of the entire Wycliffe College Literary Society following the resignation of the Elizabethan Party Continued on Nov. 13. The EPC was the third government

Toronto Debaters To Face UWO Talkers

University of Toronto debaters face opponents from the University of Western Ontario tonight on the topic "University Education Should be a Prerogative of the Intellectual Elite".

The debate which will see U of T debaters Mac Wallace and Mike Thompson upholding the noes against D'Arcy Luxton and Peter Brown of Western will be held in the Hart House Debates Room.

"This is an extremely timely topic in view of the report of President Bissell's advisory committee," U of T Debating Union Committee member Linda Silver said last night. "All third class students should attend."

Women will be welcome at the debate which starts at 8.30 p.m.

to be overturned this year by a motion of non-confidence.

The two parties which contest the election are the Confederates and the Theocrats.

Platforms and slates of the two groups were posted yesterday after they had been approved by the four-man permanent executive of the College, headed by Gov.-Gen. Ledger.

The Confederates, who claim that "we, of the South desire to foster friendly relations (not objecting, of course, to good clean fun) with our neighbours to the North", have pledged themselves to making improvements in the telephone situation and the provision of a better Reading Room service if elected. They have also promised they will "review the Constitution with a view to making it a more workable and efficient basis for democratic government" if they are given the mandate by the electors.

The leader of the party is Jim Merry (IV UC).

The second party to throw its hat in the ring, the Theocrats, is headed by Bob Wilkinson (IV SPS).

Besides being pledged to take immediate action on the telephone issue, the Reading Room problem, and an investigation of the Constitution, the party has said it will redesign and reorder the Wycliffe College ties if returned to office.

The Theocrats say they will also set up "a beneficent fund for retired Prime Ministers and provide a do-it-yourself Petition Form with handy blanks, and index of likely names for ardent Petitioners."

The overthrow of the Elizabethan Party two weeks ago left the House without any opposition party to form the government. This precipitated a constitutional crisis because the Wycliffe Constitution makes no provision for such a situation.

Tomorrow will be the first time in the history of the Wycliffe Lit that mid-year elections have been held.

Wycliffe's student government is responsible for decisions on all student affairs, including financial matters.

Pearson Slams PC Fiscal Plan

Canada's chief Liberal told students yesterday the country's future looks "grim" in the wake of the present economic situation.

Speaking to a packed campus Liberal club meeting, Lester B. Pearson said the fiscal policy of the present government is leading towards "galloping inflation."

At present there is more unemployment in Canada than at any other time since the depression, he said.

The Conservatives constantly criticized the Liberals when they were in power because they "could not find jobs for everybody who needed them," he said.

The plain truth, he said, is that "today there is too much unemployment when there is so much to be done."

The Opposition Leader said he was alarmed not only at the recession but at the rapid increase in inflationary pressures.

"Increasing job potential is not going to cure the drastic reduction of the Canadian dollar," he said.

He said if the Conservatives had adopted a proposed Liberal plan for tax reduction and an increase in consumer power, the country would not have a billion dollar debt today.

Commenting on the difference between Conservatives and Liberals, he said "unlike any other party, people are assuming the word Liberal is associated with forward ideals."

He blamed the "huge defeat" of Liberals in the last election on organization within the party and an inability to present properly party principles to the country.

He said all parties in the House of Commons were unanimous in supporting legislation leading to world peace and international security.

He called for Canada to adopt a freer trade policy with Great Britain to discourage Canadian dependence on United States interests.

Pearson said the old Liberal policy of the least interference in business has given away to a new

A Student Prank?

Find Abandoned Safe Police Seek Thieves

The 250-pound safe stolen from the Engineering Society Offices Tuesday was discovered on campus yesterday within 36 hours of the theft.

No trace has been found of the thieves who broke into the SPS Offices and took the safe—with all Engineering records and $1,300 in cash and cheques.

Detectives Ronald Stirling and Charlie Weir said they would continue investigations—even though the theft may have been a student prank.

The safe was found on the overpass south of Elmsley Hall, St. Michael's College residence, at about 8.30 last night.

Engineering Society President Rick Schaeff said the safe contained $800 in cash and $500 in cheques. All money and records were intact when opened by police late last night.

"It would have been a great loss if we had not recovered those books," said Schaeff.

Police have taken finger-prints on the safe in an effort to establish identity of the thieves.

Thieves had used a ladder to gain access to the second storey window for the break-in. Three windows on ground-floor offices had been broken, apparently in the same break-in.

The window sills are 15 feet above the ground. The massive safe left a foot-deep hole in the ground after it was tossed out the window.

There are rumors on campus that the safe was taken by a group of Victoria College students attempting to steal the Skule Cannon.

Speculation by Schaeff was that the thieves intended to fire the cannon at the Mulock Cup finals Wednesday.

"The cannon definitely wasn't in the safe—we fired it at the game," Schaeff explained.

The cannon was in another SPS safe—probably a little too big for amateur thieves. It weighs more than 1,000 pounds, Schaeff said.

An attempt was made a year ago to steal the larger safe to get at the cannon, Frank Collins, last year's cannoneer said.

The safe was found lying on its side and slogans had been painted on it in yellow paint, "Merry Christmas" and "Zorro" were scrawled across the safe.

The safe was removed by truck to police headquarters.

Prud'homme Out As Council Fails To Back Editors

OTTAWA (CUP) — Trouble has boiled over at the University of Ottawa which may mean a complete overhaul of the present student government.

A fiery four-hour session of the Students' Federation ended early yesterday morning. When the smoke cleared away the federation was without a president, and the resignation of the three student editors of La Rotonde had been accepted.

Debate raged furiously until on the fifth motion of the night the Federation accepted by an 8-5 vote the resignations tendered by editors Louis Cliche, Roger Roy, and Pierre Trudel.

Student President Marcel Prud'homme had led opposition to the university's dismissal of the three editors.

Prud'homme announced his decision to resign with tears rolling down his cheeks after the council voted to back down in their stand against the administration and accept the resignations of the editors.

"There was no other decision but to resign," Prud'homme explained last night, "and I still believe this."

"Just 15 days ago they had supported the editors because it was a matter of principle—if they can back down so easily on a matter of principle, I can't."

Yesterday on the campus a referendum was held in the faculty of Political Science, whose council representative had voted against the editors. Only seven students backed the rep, and 29 submitted a ballot of complete non-confidence.

Today a similar referendum will be taken in the Arts faculty, with similar results expected.

"You might arrive at the end of next week with all the students disagreeing with their representatives," Prud'homme said last night.

"I am ready to take on any student in a debate anywhere any time to justify my stand—or any university official for that matter," he said.

Prud'homme reiterated the stand taken at the meeting claiming that there was no liberty of expression as far as French-speaking students are concerned.

French-speaking Prud'homme had made this point during a motion to abolish La Rotonde. Many things could be printed in the English-language Fulcrum which wouldn't get passed in La Rotonde, he explained.

The motion accepting the resignations of the editors noted the action was taken "with very great regret." It was taken because of extreme pressure on the Federation and on the editors, the motion said.

A federation meeting today will wrestle with the problem of finding a new president to fill in for Prud'homme.

It is possible Prud'homme may run again on a platform supporting the editors of La Rotonde, in open defiance of university authorities.

Last night Prud'homme interpreted the stand taken by Dean Leonard Ducharme as the position of the university.

The three editors had told Ducharme they would resign if he would revoke the dismissal, admitting student authority over student activities, but Ducharme refused the offered peace.

Professors Keep Promise, Resign

WINNIPEG (CUP)—United College, engulfed in a storm of controversy and protest since the firing of Prof. Harry Crowe, yesterday lost the head of its history department and two other professors who quit in support of Crowe.

Prof. J. H. Stewart Reid, chairman of the history department; Prof. K. W. McNaught, associate professor of history; and R. M. Stingle, assistant professor of English, proffered resignations to the small college in support of demands Crowe be rehired.

In a statement, the Board of Regents of the college said reinstatement of Crowe, fired following a dispute with the college over a private letter which reached the college principal, would not satisfy the demands of the three.

The Board of Regents said the demands of the three professors made untenable the position of the college dean of arts and of the Principal W. C. Lockhart.

The resignations of the three became effective Aug. 31, 1959.

Centre of the whirlwind dispute is a letter written by Prof. Crowe to a colleague at United College while Crowe was at Queen's University, Kingston.

The letter was intercepted by Principal Lockhart. Contents of the letter have not been made public, but it is understood to have contained criticisms of the college administration.

Monday, a 78-page report by a special committee of the Canadian Association of University Teachers said Crowe had been a victim of an injustice. The letters of resignation were submitted by the three professors prior to release of the report.

De 'Nensis

Torontonensis sales manager Carol Levine said last night, "Nensis sales have gushed. We have hundreds of them."

"The emphasis in 'Nensis is on frosh activities, and the book is intended for others than graduating students," she said.

Tomorrow is the last day 'Nensis may be bought at $4. Next week the price will be raised to $4.50. Booths are still set up in most faculties.

After noon today people with 'Nensis receipts may sign the autograph pages in the 'Nensis office.

Honor Scholars Here At Fall Convocation

Two North American scholars will be presented with honorary Doctor of Law degrees at the U of T's Fall Convocation in Convocation Hall tonight.

CCFer Critical Of Wintermeyer

The Ontario secretary of the CCF yesterday said John Wintermeyer, Ontario Liberal leader, has a type of mind 'contrary to the concept of democracy.'

Ken Bryden, addressing a campus CCF meeting, said after a Liberal convention this summer Mr. Wintermeyer had announced he was about to draw up a Liberal platform and would reveal it to the Liberals in the next few months.

At a later convention, Mr. Bryden said, the Liberal leader had declined to release his platform for fear the Conservatives would steal some planks.

"What kind of democratic action is this?" Mr. Bryden said, "not to be prepared to tell the people what you would do if you were elected?"

"As far as I am concerned," he said, Mr. Wintermeyer "has no platform and very little idea of what to put in one."

The Liberals, he said, have nothing to fear from a CCF-Canadian Labor Congress merger. Truly liberal Liberals will find a place in it and the rest of them can join the Tories.

"The Liberals," he said, "will find a way of achieving their aims which has not been possible in their own party." He said the merger should come within the next 18 months to two years.

"Natural gas is likely to become a more important source of power than hydro-electric power," Mr. Bryden said. "The present government is making natural gas a happy hunting ground for every 'quick-buck grabber'."

"If you students give up some of your scruples, you can make a fortune in this field," he said. "We would have a publicly-owned system to bring natural gas to Ontario at cost."

Carabins Chaotically Are Here

Bienvenue aux Carabins

BENSON WRIGHT

La plus cordiale bienvenue à nos confères canadiens-français de l'Université de Montréal. Que nous ayons attendu impatiemment pendant une pleine année pour cette fin de semaine inoubliable. Nous souhaitons que votre court séjour sur le campus et dans la Ville-Reine sera des plus agréables.

Comment cette idée du voyage carabineque a-t-elle été conçue? Monsieur Wm. MacDougal, étudiant à Toronto en 1947, en route pour un séminar en Allemagne a fait la connaissance d'un groupe d'étudiants de U. de Montréal. "Pourquoi ne pas faire un échange universitaire entre les deux universités chaque année?" pensait-il. Et le résultat de ce coup de pensée? En 1948 Toronto a envoyé la troupe du "All Varsity Revue" à Montréal et de Montréal il est arrivé la troupe de "Le Revue Bleu et Or". C'est ainsi que le "Varsity Weekend" est né. Au cours des années le programme n'a guère change. Grâce à la grande velleur de l'échange, à l'enthousiasme des étudiantes, et au dévouement extraordinaire des organisateurs, le projet est devenue une tradition précieuse. C'est une activité à laquelle des représentants de toutes les facultés de deux universités participent vivement.

Vendredi matin, les carabins assisteront aux conférences diverses qui les attirent, et visiteront ensuite le campus et Hart House. A midi et demi, ils vont déjeuner au Howard Ferguson Hall de University College. A partir de deux heures de l'après-midi une conférence sur "La Position de la Démocratie dans la Province de Québec en 1958" aura lieu dans Falconer Hall. Avant que les carabins se divisent dans les groupes de dix ou plus pour la discussion, M. Gerard Filion, directeur du Devoir, va prononcer un discours. Il est un luttteur formidable dans l'arène politique de Québec. Ensuite il y aura une réception et un dîner à Hart House.

Samedi matin les Carabins vont profiter d'un tour d'orientation de la ville de Toronto. Ce tour vise à les montrer que la vie torontoise comporte d'autre activités que le monde commercial et financier. Dans l'après-midi les séminars vont continuer à St. Michael's College.

Dimanche, il y aura une messe à St. Basil, et puis un dîner dans les familles des étudiants torontois. Ensuite, la tristesse et le bonheur se mêlèrent dans un thé d'au revoir à Victoria College. Le départ du train: quatre heures.

Le résultat de ces échanges? Au cours des années ces rencontres ont aidé à convaincre les Torontois aussi bien que les Montrealais que le but de la culture canadienne n'est pas un mélange, mais une société comprenant deux cultures qui demeurent distinctes tout en se complétant l'une l'autre. Chaque Carabin puise dans une culture que n'est pas la sienne et y découvre des trésors qu'il ne soupçonnait pas.

Bienvenue, Carabins. Nous espérons que vous passerez tous une joyeuse fin de semaine et que vous vous ferez des nouveaux amis parmi nous. Toronto est à vous.

The acting assistant station master was unhappy: more than that he was disgruntled.

Some 40 barbarian university students—wearing gay blue and white touques and singing at the tops of their voices—had suddenly descended on his sedate domain.

"It looks like another one of those damn football weekends", he grumbled as three scantily dressed cheerleaders erupted with "Velut Arbor Aevo" uncomfortably close to his person.

It wasn't a football weekend and pretty soon the cheerleaders proved it by yelling weird things in bad French.

It was the beginning of the three-day Carabin weekend.

The 40 University of Montreal Students who hit the campus last night did justice to their reputation.

From the moment they poured off their coach and flowed down the platform on a wave of gaiety, until they reached their rendezvous in Trinity's buttery, they didn't stop looking happy.

The Montreal group entered the waiting room in a triumphant mass. There was a split second of embarrassed silence as 80 strangers looked at each other.

Then the moment broke, formality was thrown to the winds, chaos descended and the acting assistant station master wept.

Old friends shook hands, new friends kissed, everybody talked at once until finally the melee sorted itself out.

They were happy and they were friendly. Ahead of them lies a packed period of parties and discussions, good times, interesting times and serious times.

They are young and they are easy — and they have already begun to understand each other.

Bennet Rankled

Students at Victoria College, B.C., greeted Premier Bennet with jeers and a shower of refuse recently.

Students heckled the Premier and gave three cheers for H. Lee Briggs, former general manager of the British Columbia Power Commission who was dismissed for attacking government policies.

Premier Bennet, who was visiting the college at the request of the students, said that he was willing to answer Mr. Briggs' questions publicly "any time I'm around."

Dental Yearbook Wanders Afield Turning Into Ontario Dents History

This year's issue of Hya Yaka, the Dental Faculty's yearbook, is in the process of turning into the first history of Ontario dental education ever published, its co-editors said Wednesday.

Originally the idea of Dental Society publications director Harold Marcus, the issue will mark the 50th and probably the last anniversary of present faculty quarters at 230 College St., Ed Gazo, his co-editor, said.

The faculty is to move to University Ave., next year.

Dr. Joseph Johnson head, of the faculty's surgery department is compiling a history of Ontario dental education for the volume.

The book has been offered to each of the 2,740 living graduates of the faculty and its predecessor, the Royal College of Dental Surgeons.

Oldest graduate being offered a copy graduated from the Royal College in 1892. In two weeks more than 500 alumni have already sent orders for the volume, Gazo said.

Grads will be asked to contribute pictures and articles to the new magazine, Gazo said. "This is not only the students' but their book as well."

The book, to be comparable in size with Torontonensis, the U of T yearbook, will be divided into two sections.

One, under Marcus' editorship, will be a regular faculty yearbook for 1958-59. The other, under Gazo, will be the anniversary issue going back to the foundation of the Royal College in 1892.

The work will be "almost a textbook" of dental history, Marcus said.

The faculty will be offering orders for the yearbook at today's convention of the Academy of Dentistry in the Royal York Hotel.

The editors are happy with the alumni response so far, Gazo said. "We're going to press."

"A Little Touch Of Harry In The Night"

Shakespeare's Henry V is generally considered his most exciting history, and judging by the brilliant performance England's Old Vic Company accorded the epic drama last night, it is not very hard to see why.

It was a production in which director Michael Bentham's fine sense of drama, and his great gift for comic business was felt throughout. Never have the Pistol scenes come off so comically; never have the sudden fluctuations from great joy to great grief in these selfsame scenes been so masterfully handled; and seldom have we, whose jaded palates have too long tasted of the Earle Grey Shakespeare Festival, and even the Toronto Shakespeare Society, been so excited by one of Shakespeare's plays. Even our own Stratford somehow seems very staid and domestic in comparison with this exciting troupe of English actors.

A major part of the excitement was in a sort of rediscovery of the multitudinous treasures to be found in the plays themselves: as spoken by most of the Old Vic actors, Shakespeare's poetry came across crystal clear, and we stood in awe of its greatness and constant variety. It was almost a religious experience.

Henry V is a popular play because of all the histories, it is complete in itself: its predecessors, Richard II, and the two parts of Henry IV, all look ahead to this play; those that follow, the three parts of Henry VI and Richard III, are in a class by themselves, and especially notable for their bitterness and sense of disaster, until Henry VIII defeats the monster Richard, and once more the sun shines on England, and civil dissension is cleared away.

Henry V is complete in itself, and yet hearkens back to the three preceding plays. Richard II dealt with a fundamentally good king and good man. But he is great only in defeat; he returns from the ill-fated Irish Campaign with a new understanding and love for his native land. Later, when bayed about with enemies, he becomes a Christ-like figure, displaying a morality far greater than any of these self-avowed saviors of the people can claim.

His death hangs heavy over Henry IV; who is a good king, but like Claudius, tormented by the thought of his guilt. Finally there is Henry V, who, though at first seemed to be carrying out Richard's curse, shakes himself free and becomes both a good king and a good man. This is the reason that his prayer to God to absolve him from the original sin of Richard's death is so poignant in its intensity.

The ensuing plays show the degradation of the crown to its final reduction ad absurdum — the misshapen monster Richard III, who can by no stretch of the imagination be considered either a good king nor by any means at all anything approaching a good man. Henry VII, a rather minor figure in the play, a symbol of the new order finally puts the enormous conflicts of social order and political anarchy to rest and inaugurates the glorious line which was to result in Elizabeth.

For their choice of the King, the Old Vic has made a serious mistake in choosing Laurence Harvey; his speech is too affected, his use of his vocal range too limited to fully serve Shakespeare's poetry; I have never been so unmoved by the "Once more unto the breach" speech, precisely because Harvey refuses to follow the ebb and flow of Shakespeare's lines. He was at his best in the quiet lyrical scene following the Battle of Agincourt, and managed to play the rough lover very well, although with a singular lack of humor.

The rest of the company, though, was excellent. In particular, Joseph O'Connor as the Chorus, Dudley Jones as Fluellen, Richard Wordsworth as Pistol, and Judi Dench as Katherine, stood out most prominently. But perhaps the most impressive aspect of the production were the many beautiful tableaux, which so much resembled medieval illuminations.

The play moved along rapidly; there was not a dragging moment in it, and pauses when they came, came with a great impact. All one can really find to complain about in this production were the numerous cuts that were made to give the play a more commercial length.

But perhaps the greatest contribution this company has made has been to shake Toronto audiences out of their lethargy, and let us hope back to their Shakespeare.

Warren Wilson

Gary Packer presenting the family jewels to Dawn Egton in the Hart House production of "The Late George Apley", starting to-morrow.

YERMA

Fresh from their success with Pirandello's "As You Desire Me", the University Alumnae Dramatic Club will be presenting another major work, Federico Garcia Lorca's monumental tragedy, YERMA, at their new headquarters, 200 Bedford Road.

The play will be under the expert guidance of Frances Halpenmy, and the cast will include Elizabeth Mascall, Martin Hunter, Powell Jones, Judith Teague, Barbara Barnett, Eleanor Beecroft, Kathy Totton, Muriel Cuttall, Margaret Tytler, Ruth Rashkis, Helen Dunlop, Doris Stacey, Eileen Williams, Eleanor Stewart, Peggy Sherriff, Ivor Jackson, Molly Goldby, and our own Pamela Thayer in a most exacting role.

The production has been designed by Martha Mann.

YERMA will be performed December 3-7 and 10-14 inclusive, at 8:30 p.m. at the Coach House Theatre.

Reservations may be made by getting in touch with Mrs. McNabb, 450 Winona Drive, RU 2-7594. One dollar supports the productions in the Coach House Theatre.

Remember our slogan — get more out of life: go out to a legitimate theatre for once in your life.

my sainted ancestor

Will wonders never cease? Richard Wordsworth, who claims to be the great-great-grandson of the celebrated poet, William Wordsworth, regaled a crowd of some 150 souls in Hart House Theatre with selections from Shakespeare, as well as the works of his revered ancestor.

He does not need to rely merely on his lineage these days—he is currently appearing as Malvolio in the Old Vic production of "Twelfth Night", and managing to keep his audience vastly amused.

The first of his readings were devoted to Wordsworth's "Preludes". He explained his choice of these by saying "I grew in my ancestor's foot-prints very closely."

And so saying, he proceeded to read from Book One of the Preludes, dealing with Wordsworth's childhood in the Lake District, where he, too, spent his early days.

Seeking to prove that the poet had a sense of humor (which, alas, has been much denied by commentators), Mr. Wordsworth read excerpts from Wordsworth's writings while at Cambridge, where his great-great-grandson also spent his formative years.

Finishing up his Wordsworth readings, he included the sonnets, such as "The world is too much with us," and "Lines Composed upon Westminster Bridge," as well as works written in Paris during the French Revolution. These latter were "an answer to those who think that Wordsworth perpetually wrote about daffodils."

Mr. Wordsworth next turned to Shakespeare, reading selections from "Othello", on the grounds that it was good policy to stay with one play and follow it through, rather than to present the audience with a vast conglomeration of selections.

His readings included the scene in the Senate, the Jealousy scene, and an excellent portrayal of the murder scene. He showed he was not afraid to attempt two parts at once; the murder scene in particular was well carried out, despite Mr. Wordsworth's obvious limitations for the part of Desdemona.

The reading concluded with four of Shakespeare's sonnets, in order to "sound a more cheerful note amidst the encircling gloom."

Morgan Tamplin

the Merchant of Yonkers—and whacky Wilderisms

The Matchmaker (Hollywood) is Shirley Booth on the middle-aged make and when it comes to brewing instant mayhem and delight, no one can match her.

In the title role of this charming screen adaptation of Thornton Wilder's loud, loose and lunatic 1956 stage success, Actress Booth plays Mrs. Dolly Levi, a widow of parts whose calling cards proffer such divers services as the curing of varicose veins or the chasing of runaway husbands. In her own interests, Dolly chases Horace Vandergelder (Paul Ford), possibly the richest merchant in all Yonkers in 1884, until he catches her. Her mission is complicated, however, by the skinflinty old merchant's preference for finance rather than romance. The rather tenuous plot line also carries on its bubbling surface the uprooting of fashionable New York by its Vandergelder's prurient clerks (Tony Perkins, Robert Morse), their search for "adventure" in a millinery shop tended by pert Shirley MacLaine and enough pratfalls and slapstick to put a circus clown to shame. Generally, it's all good fun in a farcical sort of way.

Director Joseph Anthony keeps the whole production rollicking briskly and Screenwriter John Michael Hayes manages to preserve enough "Wilderisms" to fill an anthology.

"Ninety-nine percent of the people in the world are fools and the rest of us are in great danger of contagion", Actor Ford slyly informs the viewer, looking him straight in the eye, a stagey device used extensively, but quite successfully herein.

"Money is like manure", confides Actress Booth, "it's not worth anything unless it's spread around".

And of course, there is a moral, or, in this case, several morals; love is nice to have around the house; practice only one vice at a time; everyone should take a day off and go in search of "adventure".

Frankly, we'd suggest you take a night off and go see The Matchmaker. It may not be an "adventure", but it assuredly is a delight.

Ever since the U of T's new tuition plan was made public the idea of the university as the isolated home of an intellectual elite has come into prominence. Every attitude from delight to despair has greeted this concept. But as a prelude to taking sides it might be enlightening to look at some of the philosophical antecedents of the "intellectual elite" idea.

Man has been defined as a rational animal, "homo sapiens." Of course the rational is not man's only activity. He both thinks and acts. But our philosophical tradition has separated the thinking man from the acting man. This gap has become wider and wider to the point where the thinking man now smokes only Viceroy cigarettes while the acting man smokes Marlboroughs.

Viceroy definitely have the edge, because with the dichotomy of thought and action the idea also developed that to think was in some way a higher activity than to act.

The greatest exponent of this gap was Plato. To him the split in human psychology represented a real split in the world. Man's rational contemplation functioned in a higher world of enduring concepts while he lived and acted in a lower world of fleeting images.

During the Middle Ages there was some attempt to bring thought and action together but sooner or later the synthesis always fell apart and the separation of intellect and will in the human psychology was bequeathed to the modern world as a basic and firmly entrenched presupposition.

The dichotomy had its religious side too. The world of action was the world of the flesh, and it was taken to be spiritually lower than the world of spirit, which was the world of thought. The spiritual temperament tends to see God, the unmoved mover at the upper end of the scale of values and matter, that is moved but moves nothing else at the other end.

These philosophical considerations with little alteration can be thought of as the foundation for the kind of university community that would result from the new tuition proposals.

These proposals definitely point to the establishing of universities as intellectually elite communities. The financial part of the plan would bring together in the university a group of first class students, and the vacation proposals including provision for vacation assignments would mean that even if these students had occasional rest from school they would have no rest from academic considerations. In all likelihood most members of such scholarly groups devoting all their time to thought would remain in the university community as professors researchers, or just plain thinkers.

Meanwhile, back in the outside world of business and politics the men of action would function. Society on the whole would work just like the human mind worked in the naive philosophical sketch we gave a while back; one cubbyhole—the university—for the intellect, and another cubbyhole—the outside world—for the will.

Of course, in society just as in the mind, there would have to be interplay between the two cubbyholes. Just as the intellect formulates the basis for the action of the will, which then acts on it, the university would form a "brain trust" formulating principles on the basis of research, and the outside world would expect it to provide a foundation for action.

Society would then consist of constant comings and goings between two dwellings; the one containing those who act but do not think; that are moved but do not move others, and the other containing those who think but do not act, the unmoved movers—between the smoke filled room and the ivory tower.

Such an arrangement possibly has much to commend it. But we are inclined to think that the kind of man who can best serve in to-day's world is the man who can both think and act. It is worth considering that the men our society needs live neither exclusively in the smoke filled room nor exclusively in the ivory tower, but in a smoke filled ivory tower.

To write an article of six hundred words on agnosticism in 1958 is analogous to preparing a version of the Old Testament for Reader's Digest. In both instances, the intellectual reward for the author from such a task would be considerable but the results for the reader are vacuous; they are forms without substance. This, then, is not such an attempt.

The previous writers in this series entitled Credo have approached the problem with a bravado that could spring only from unquestionable, absolute faith. They have discussed religion and God as though both were taken for granted by themselves and their readers. I felt they were more concerned with describing denominational differences (which perhaps they were requested to do) than with what perhaps are the more crucial questions: What is God? Is God a concept in the mind alone or does he exist in some other way as well? Is there a way in which we can use the term 'God' and not mean an entity to which we can pray? Is God an abstract principle which encompasses all the abstract generalizations of science? Is God the universe conceived of as a whole? Is God the protector of Man? Is God a projected father-figure? Is He (or it) that which is involved in all I-Thou relationships? Is God the unmoved mover? And, lastly, can we in any sense 'know' God?

To write in defence of agnosticism in any sort of honest fashion, I would have to consider each of these in turn. It would be necessary to consider at least the religion and/or metaphysics of Plato, Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas, Spinoza, Kant, Hegel, Kirkegaard, Buber, Eddington, Whitehead, Tillich, Jaspers and Freud — not to mention the Bible. One of the biggest and most consistent headaches Europe has to offer to the Western world this week disturbingly renewed itself to the discomfort of the big three Western allies.

Suddenly revived, the question of a divided Germany and, more important, Berlin, appeared to have the West over a barrel to the delight of the Soviets.

A week of proposals and counter-proposals, tempered liberally with Communist threats of blockade, set the U.S. preparing for another airlift while reports filtered out of East Germany that Red fighter pilots were getting pointers on how to force down Western transport aircraft.

Most embarrassing to the United States, France, and Great Britain, was the Soviet offer to make Berlin a "free city", possibly under United Nations vigilance.

By Friday the Soviets had thrown most of their cards on the table. Withdrawal of their own forces had already been promised. Now they declared the 1944-45 Big Four occupation agreement as null and void.

Most unhappy of all in a ticklish situation were those least considered by the international powers: the citizens of West Berlin whose leaders yesterday flatly refused to consider proposals that would turn their city into a no-man's land, demilitarized, and surrounded by Communist East Germany.

Meanwhile, in neighboring France, Premier Charles De Gaulle easily weathered his first legislative elections as voters turned a cold eye on Communist representation in the by Fifth Republic and supported members bearing the Gaullist pennant.

In Canada, threatened strikes seemed to remain the most important national factors. In Ontario, officers of the 10,000-member Hydro Employees Union Tuesday turned down a conciliation board recommendation for a 3½ per cent wage hike.

In Toronto, the civic election campaign was getting very hot through the week, heading rambunctiously toward the Dec. 1 voting date.

High point in the comedy came when Controllers Cornish, Allen and Jean Newman stamped out of a meeting of the Native Sons of Canada because the Native Sons didn't feel like playing "God Save the Queen".

Basis of an ensuing argument with one of the Native Sons was that the Queen is the national anthem. The Son felt otherwise: it's actually a prayer and therefore denominational. In the course of events, Controller Cornish and Native Son J. A. Picard exchanged war records and everyone got in the papers.

citizens, but he felt it was important that Canadian students watch at least one session to learn where their money goes, and how their student government works.

Preparations for dances, outings, and nearly all the other social events are the result of American efforts. Many of the parties sponsored by American students are designed to provide an informal atmosphere for students of both countries to meet. But few Canadians bother going.

It's admitted day students find it harder to take part in extra curricular affairs than those in residence. Still council members find it difficult to understand why day-hops with less than 24 lectures per week can't find the time to join some college activity.

The college offers a Western course to give American students the chance to get fifth form standing before entering first year university.

During this year students not only learn the score on campus life, but also form a small nucleus of friends, before Canadian students arrive the next year.

To offset this advantage day-students are encouraged from all quarters to take their place in college life. Still they remain cold to its activities.

And no one can seem to find an explanation for the inability of Canadian residence students to match the enthusiasm of their American counterparts.

The fact is, Americans are running SMC student activities, and doing a good job. But the job could be better. If Canadian day students pulled their weight and helped out, they could give the college spirit a shot in the arm.

What Quebec Editors Say

By JOHN GRAY

The student press of the Quebec universities has been hammering away at their beloved Premier Maurice Duplessis for many years. The attack has been heightened in the last year by Duplessis' refusal to meet with student leaders to discuss the educational plight of the province.

But a few weeks ago the premier stooped from his supercilious perch and offered to meet with student presidents of the province's six universities. The reaction among university papers was one of happiness tempered with a good deal of caution.

Said the McGill Daily of the proposed meeting: "This by itself is regarded as somewhat of a landmark in this province. In fact, it is only a simple exercise of their right as citizens of Canada."

But after editorial cheers for the new student aid plan forwarded by U of T President Claude T. Bissell, the Daily warned their leaders: "We highly recommend that they approach the premier with an open mind, but that they bear in mind the proposals offered in the Province of Ontario, and view those of our Premier in that light."

In University of Montreal's Quartier Latin, the stress is on possible action taken by the premier—if any—and what such action should be.

The brief submitted to the provincial government last January did not ask primarily for student aid, the writer warns. The main consideration is financial relief for the universities of the province.

Continuing the fight for more substantial statutory grants to relieve the present financial crisis, Quartier Latin says extensive student relief as a prime factor would be "a false solution."

"It is more important for our society to possess universities of a superior calibre than to permit more youngsters to frequent universities which haven't even got necessary funds to survive."

In a previous editorial Quartier Latin lashed out at the promise of student loans by the premier—a promise he made in August to the University Action League, a group of Duplessis stooges.

Student loans are of course needed, said the U of M writer, but they are not adequate by themselves. A more extensive bursary system is needed, and especially necessary is a shake-up of the system.

"Loans, study bursaries, private initiative, timid government interventions are only stop-gaps. We need a really democratic teaching system which gives to our youngsters an equal chance at the beginning, without regard to their social status or degree of wealth."

From Quebec City, Laval's Le Carabin gave a cry recently that was at once typical of many of the intellectuals in the province, and indicative of the political situation in which the province finds itself.

In an editorial entitled "Of Socialism and the Church", Editor Jean Claude Lebel turns full fire on the contemporary thinking about socialism and communism.

By denouncing socialism—which they associate with Marxian materialism—political leaders are hopeful of currying favor with the Church, he says.

For many in Quebec recently socialism seems the only branch of political philosophy not thoroughly explored by Quebec politicians with disastrous results.

The Church has never fully investigated socialism as it exists in Canada, says Le Carabin, but it must lead the way to exploring the value of all political ideals.

"We can ask the Canadian Church to examine its position in face of the possible arrival of a political structure called Canadian socialism."

The present well-established bourgeoisie would be surprised to read in history later that it had caused a Canadian revolution, because it was too reactionary for its times," says Le Carabin.

The Church must lead the way towards the solution to the political problems facing Canada: "It has a mission to teach as the Church of Christ. Why then does it not reply to that question of great consequence, contributing in this way to killing a myth which exists only to fill more the seat of the bourgeoisie, by knowing whether the social doctrine of Canadian socialism is acceptable in the light of the essential truths of which the Church is the holder."

The Varsity - a special report on The SHARE Campaign

On Monday, World University Service representatives on this campus will begin a week-long fund-raising campaign to raise money for aid to needy foreign students. Called Share, this campaign is one of only two official requests for funds made annually to students on this campus.

This special report has been prepared in an attempt to provide information on WUS itself, and on the special projects where Share funds will be used this year.

What it is...

In a world where racial discrimination, violence and the hatred of whole nations threatens the existence of mankind, there comes a story.

It is the story of humanity, of people who take time to reach out across the frontiers of prejudice and hate to help those in other nations less fortunate than their own.

The World University Service is that story. And the people in it are students from 14 nations who canvass aid to better the plight of their fellow students in underdeveloped countries.

In 1920, professors and students from six European countries met amid the rubble of World War I to draw up a plan which would help the students of a devastated Europe back on their feet. They created an organization called the International Student Service.

With the success of the European venture, the idea caught on and in 1925 it was re-christened World University Service and enlarged to include needy students everywhere.

The aim of the Service is to help the growth of an international university community by provision of money and knowledge to the universities of poor countries.

From its headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland, it works through national committees to assess needs and distribute aid accordingly.

U of T was the starting point for WUS in Canada. In 1939 Hart House warden J. B. Bickert and the late Prof. J. R. Riddell were instrumental in bringing Canadian students into the WUS picture.

Since then every university in Canada has become a member of the organization. In this country, WUS hopes to top last year's total contribution of $16,000 by $4,000.

Canada is "considered to be the most ambitious and fastest-growing member of the WUS community," Lewis Perinbam, general secretary of WUS of Canada says.

"Nations of the world have come to respect our country through the leadership it has provided in WUS."

The two basic methods Canadian students use to raise money are personal canvassing and the sponsoring of treasure vans across the country. The treasure van program has been so successful that it has been imitated by Germany, England and the Netherlands in the past year.

Part of the proceeds gained from fund-raising campaigns are sent to Geneva. The rest goes to specific needy projects WUS has taken a special interest in developing.

Canadian universities also sponsor foreign scholars as part of their WUSC programs. This year Mohammed Ali Dokamish is studying at U of T for his master's degree in engineering under a scholarship arranged by U of T engineers. Skulemen hope to sponsor another foreign student this year.

And this year Hillel, a Jewish organization on campus, is channeling aid through WUS to the special WUSC project in Israel.

Internationally, the WUS General Assembly carefully examines each project before appropriating funds and distributing them through Geneva.

Another feature of WUS activity is the sponsorship of international seminars to give university students a chance to understand and express themselves on an international level in terms of their own background.

A by-product of these meetings is the spread of international good will by grouping together students of many different national backgrounds.

Last year's summer seminar was held in Yugoslavia. This year WUS has chosen the West Indies as the site of its seminar in 1959.

WUS is "the university answer to the Colombo Plan, but on a world wide scale," Mr. Perinbam says.

"WUS students are taking the leading role in firing the imagination of the world with a first class example of true human compassion."

WUS is a big story. It is told countless times every year in the terms of those university students who care enough to lend a helping hand.

Money collected from the SHARE campaign will be used by World University Service to finance five special projects in its International Program of Action. The five projects are in:

ISRAEL: Canada has been asked to contribute $1,000 of the $3,256 needed to supply badly needed equipment to the Hebrew University Publishing House. This company was established six years ago with a capital fund of $110, and publishes mimeographed textbooks, lecture notes, and manuals at 40 per cent discounts.

Because of currency exchange difficulties, the company cannot obtain equipment it needs for expansion. WUS will attempt to buy and ship these materials.

EGYPT: Cairo's University Health Service is campaigning for $37,991 for the purchase of X-ray equipment to detect tuberculosis. It has so far raised almost $13,000 for the equipment. WUS hopes to contribute $2,558, of which Canada's share will be $1,000.

...what it does

INDIA: The University of Allahabad has one small dispensary to handle the medical needs of 8,000 students. Total cost is estimated at $12,558, and it is expected that half this amount can be raised within India. WUS's contribution for purchase and shipment of equipment this year will be $2,558, of which Canada has been asked to contribute $1,000.

VIETNAM: Medical investigation among Vietnamese students shows the incidence of tuberculosis is especially high there. WUS plans to make an emergency appropriation of $1,861 for purchase of X-ray film and equipment. Canada has been asked to provide $1,000 of this sum.

JAPAN: In the past, aid to Japan has been concentrated on providing X-ray equipment to combat TB. This year WUS will use its funds to aid WUS of Japan in improving living conditions, another means of fighting TB. WUS plans to provide $4,651 toward the establishment of a Co-operative Student Centre and Hostel in Tokyo, where living conditions are especially inadequate. Canada will attempt to provide $1,000 of this sum.

A student who has held second class standing and no standing at all, speaks:

Two unequal strata at Toronto lie,
Those who get "A's" and those who dare not try.
The latter oft complain that no incentive
Exists to make them work and more attentive,
So they protect and nurture infertility,
Which dormant for so long becomes sterility,
For when high waters threaten the flats below,
Who built on mud cry out for status quo.

Among the greater body some relate,
Mediocrity's a cult and not a state,
Democracy ordains this with impunity,
That no one be denied an opportunity
To accept the third class faith, the third class deity.

Acknowledging no ambition, ignorance, piety,
This shameless group by its own acclamation,
Claims it's the solid backbone of the nation,
And with its new position all a-tingle
Incensantly sings the Nicholodeon jingle;
No more the "powerhouse of our civilization"
The university is a transit station.

Unlike the man who bears his Mark like Cain,

I have more faith than he in the third class brain,
He who thinks all endeavour, all creation
Are born in his noble third class situation.
His Varsity letter is a contradiction,
His versatility makes his truth a fiction.
For if this able wit turned his attentions
To those academic tasks he mentions,
His satisfaction with the third position
Would be eclipsed by a worthier ambition,
And the practised discipline of some hard endeavour
Would cleanse him of his silliness forever.

Have no fear then, for this chimerical devil,
You have always maintained the minimum level,
To wear her mewling child each mother is bound,

Casting it out alone on unfriendly ground,
But soon it finds the barrier is a door
And each one is, or makes, one mother more.

Warned for so long in this maternal fashion
You are being denied the chance of adult passion,
Those obstacles for which you feel inept
Cannot be judged until they have been leapt.

Defend Five

Dear Sir:

I would like to comment on the editorial "intellectual rabble" which appeared in The Varsity Nov. 20.

I do not personally know any of the members of the Group of Five, and have heard very little about them (not a bad thing, since reported evidence can be very misleading).

I believe that the university should be the centre of society from which the freedom of the individual and of association is proclaimed.

If human beings have indeed severed with the community in which they live, the only way is for the community to accept them, and to act in such a way that they may come to see that they are accepted.

To focus "the full, hot light of society's condemnation" upon any person or group of persons is only to increase the present complex of schisms within society. It may be pointed out that a persecuted minority has never lacked sympathizers.

On these grounds, I oppose the attitude expressed in this editorial, and hope that the university, unhampered by such regressions, may continue to serve its function in society as the advocate of truth and freedom.

Censure Of South Africa Big In CCF Platform Here

Condemnation of South Africa's apartheid policy and a recommendation calling for Canada's withdrawal from NATO and NORAD will head the list of resolutions coming up for consideration at the third annual campus CCF convention Dec. 7.

The apartheid resolution also calls for the government to impose economic sanctions on South Africa until it "takes adequate measures to provide for the basic rights of all her people . . ."

Withdrawal from the combined defense agreements is called on the grounds that "the CCF advocates an independent foreign policy which would entail a substantial reduction in our commitments for defense expenditures . . ."

Other recommendations among the 20 that are to be put forward include: cessation of nuclear tests, research in the field of population control, a minimum wage of $1.25 per hour, revised union legislation, a more adequate health plan, abolition of capital punishment, and a revision of the Canadian constitution to declare Canada a Republic.

Resolutions will be presented in the afternoon when nominations will be taken for parliamentary leader.

The evening session will complete the hearing of the resolutions, and see balloting for parliamentary leader.

The convention will begin at 4 p.m. in Trinity's convocation hall.

Happy Frat Members Serenade With Beer

Residents of Whitney Hall and St. Hilda's were treated to an unscheduled program of mass-choir singing Wednesday night by the members of the Delta Upsilon fraternity.

Celebrating the end of the annual initiation rites—and the opening of their new fraternity house, the men gathered outside each residence and sang their fraternity song along with other numbers.

Leaving a litter of empty beer bottles and flashbubs behind them at each point, they walked for about an hour around the campus.

"The singing was pretty good, considering they were in high spirits," said Rochelle Brown, (II UC), a resident of Cody Hall.

"However," she continued, "I don't think the bottles will look very good in the morning. They might think it was us."

The size of the band of choristers decreased as the evening passed. Although there were about 30 men outside Whitney Hall, only six joined voices at St. Hilda's.

TGMO Is Organized

A surprise committee made its first report to the Students' Administrative Council Wednesday through committee secretary Sue Evans.

Called the TGMO (Thank God the Meeting's Over), the committee met for the first time two weeks ago in the Park Plaza's King Cole Room, Miss Evans said.

After impeachment of University College representatives for failing to attend the SAC meeting the committee voted to:

- introduce beer into SAC meetings to "promote general conviviality", with the provision that bottles be decorated with U of T decal labels.

- specify as a provision for membership the purchase of one round of beer for charter members.

- hold future meetings before SAC meetings to compensate for the "apparent dearth of comedians on the SAC".

- hold all meetings in the King Cole Room.

All motions were passed unanimously, Miss Evans said.

Town Planning Said Impossible

Metropolitan planning today is well-nigh impossible, a town planning expert told the campus Geography club Wednesday.

Hans Blumenfeld, assistant commissioner of the Metropolitan Planning Board was addressing club members on "The form of a metropolis".

"I don't think anybody can devise a metropolis that is functionally and aesthetically satisfying," he said.

Specialized production in all fields has produced a metropolis in which all concentrations have to hang together."

Four essentials of a metropolis are business district, manufacturing area, recreational area and residential district, he explained.

The ideal urban area would have an even balance of these four, he said.

The only cities that maintain any resemblance to a plan are Moscow and Leningrad, both of which have limited growth, he added.

Mr. Blumenfeld has worked in Europe, America, Germany and the Soviet Union.

Four U of T students have been chosen to attend a seminar on Canadian-American Relations to be held at the University of Rochester Dec. 2.

Tim Reid (IV Trin.), Alex Havriant (IV Trin.), Micael Kater (IV UC) and Don Wilson (IV Vic), will sit in on two days of talks on Canadian-American Relations and related discussions.

Mr. Lester B. Pearson will lecture on Modern Diplomacy and its Effectiveness, and "Canadian-American Relations in a Divided World" at the two-day seminar being held primarily for the University of Rochester. He will also be meeting classes for further discussions.

Rugger Blues In Final Rout Peterborough 46-0

The Varsity senior rugger Blues meet Ontario Agricultural College Saturday afternoon in Varsity Stadium in the Ontario intermediate rugger league final for the Carling Cup.

The Blues gained the final berth by trampling Peterborough 46-0 in last week's semi-final. OAC edged Balm Beach 3-0 to gain the other final position.

The semi-final contestants pitted the first team of the intermediate "A" league against the second team of the intermediate "B" loop and vice versa with the other two teams.

Varsity, who finished in first place in the "A" group, produced their best form of the season in defeating an admittedly weaker and less tough intermediate "B" team. The overwhelming victory was a team effort and individual scorers are listed only for the record.

Tries were scored by: Warren Walker (3), Tom Harper (2), Charlie Dobie (2), Jack Burger, John Brebner, Ray Cornbill and John Ward. Cornbill clicked on a convert and Neville Nankivell added four converts and a penalty goal.

The team for Saturday's game is: Fullback, Brebner, wingers, Walker, Burger; centres, Dobie, Cornbill; flyhalf, Keating; scrum half, Ward; wing forwards, Hirst, Butt; second row, Baines, Hargreaves; forwards, Harper, Chapman, Nelems, Nankivell.

Plenty Of Exercise For Girls As Winter Sports In Full Swing

By SHARON MILGRAM

Borrowing a paragraph from our scintillating sports editor's column, I would like to scan, in alphabetical order, the various girls' sports which are either beginning, ending or middling.

ARCHERY: With a successful novelty shoot just completed, plans are being made for a freshman archery meet and also a Christmas novelty shoot. The freshman tournament, which will take place December 8 and 9, between one and two o'clock, at the Drill Hall, will involve both target and novelty shooting. The only definite news regarding the Christmas meet is that it will be held on December 12.

BADMINTON: The interfaculty badminton tournament will be held December 3 at 7 p.m. at the Drill Hall. This competition is open to all birdie beaters who wish to bat the birdies, here's your chance! The only restriction is that you must sign up for the meet by December 1 at either your own faculty or Falconer Hall. The four semi-finalists will make up the intercollegiate badminton team.

BOWLING: Cards for girls practicing for interfaculty bowling are available at the athletic office at Falconer Hall. These cards, which cost $2.00 each enable you to bowl each week for the next twenty weeks. The scores of the four top interfaculty bowlers will be entered in the intercollegiate telegraphic bowling competition which is entered by universities all across Canada. In last year's tournament, U of T placed fourth.

SKIING: Since the opening meeting of the ski club was so much more successful than had been hoped for, Helen Keith, club president, has hinted that a ski weekend other than the weekend of the interfaculty meet, might be planned. With or without snow, the possibilities for such a weekend indicate lots of fun.

SWIMMING: As most of us go about our daily tasks while shivering in our boots, the Intercollegiate swim team is splashing around in the Queen's pool in preparation for the swim meet which will be held at Queen's tonight and tomorrow afternoon. Teams participating in this tournament which is an annual affair, are from Toronto, Queen's, Western and McGill.

VOLLEYBALL: As we near the end of the alphabet we reach our last sport for today. Here we find that the practices for the intercollegiate volleyball team are already under way. These practices are being held at the Drill Hall each Tuesday and Thursday at 5:30 p.m. Jutta Laul and Mrs. Vernon, manager and coach respectively of the team, hope that by getting started earlier than in previous seasons, they will be able to select the team immediately after Christmas. This it is hoped, will give them more time to work with the actual team before the Intercollegiate volleyball tournament.

Roses are red,
Violets are blue,
I've scanned the sports,
What are you going to do?

Varsity Hoopsters Drop Thriller Lose In Last Minute Of Game

By MIKE CHYKALIUK

The University of Toronto Blues hoopsters gave undefeated YMHA Seniors a real scare before bowing out 71-70 at the Spadina Avenue Gymnasium last night.

With 40 seconds remaining in the game, the score was tied 69-69. YMHA promptly sunk a field goal to go ahead while the best Varsity could do was a single foul shot. The Spadina quintet then smartly retained possession of the ball until the final whistle.

The Blues overcame an early YMHA surge to forge ahead 31-30 at the half. Varsity then padded their lead to 10 points in the early part of the second half.

However, at this point, they bogged down and subsequently blew their lead. The score was tied with three minutes left in the game. From then 'till the end the lead changed hands several times. The final whistle saw Varsity on the short end of a 71-70 score.

Outstanding for Varsity were Ruby Richman with 20 points, Peter Potter with 15, and Joe Stulac with 11. Lanky John Dacychyn, playing his first game, was a standout under the boards on rebounds.

The three top scorers gave every indication that they will be among the Blues' most effective players this season.

Hirst was the kingpin of the YMHA attack, picking up 23 points, many of them on foul shots. Other high scorers were Waters (13), and Powell (10).

Line-ups: Toronto—Stulac 11, Norman 2, Potter 15, Russell, Patterson 3, Mandel 6, Ecclestone, Goldring 8, McGuire, McKeechnie, Menczel 2, Dacychyn 3, Richman 20, Probst, Green. Total—70.

YMHA—Buntins 10, Levko 2, Nisker, Harrison 7, Unger 2, Powell 10, Hurst 23, Waters 13, Gelman 4. Total—71.

Varsity Girls In Shape For Queen's Swim Meet

By PAM HILL

Fifteen swimmers left Union Station this morning for the Intercollegiate meet at Queen's University.

Coach Miss Jackson says that the girls have never been more highly trained than this season, and the swim team is at a real competitive level. Cressy McCatty still feels they don't know the meaning of the word "training", but let's hope that in his books none of the other teams do either!

Last year, Western took top honors, with Varsity and McGill tying for third and last place. This year, Western has lost three of their ace swimmers, and the Blue and White squad achieved (a) outstanding swimmers in new members; and (b) lower times in "old stalwarts".

A brief look at the statistics:

Event	Entrant	1958	1959
200-medley relay	S. McMullen, B. Westman, S. German, G. Royce	Intercol. new event	Interfac. new event
100 freestyle	V. Lewis	1:10.2	1:15.0
50 backstroke	P. Hill	34.5	41.0
50 breaststroke	B. Westman	37.0	44.1
50 butterfly	P. Hill	34.6	43.1
50 freestyle	G. Royce	31.0	31.3
75 individual medley	V. Lewis	52.1	58.4
200 freestyle relay	G. Royce, L. Philpott, J. Medland, V. Lewis	2:02.3	no event

The girls have been training under Cressy McCatty for a month since these times, and in each event, the times are down from one to eight seconds.

Apart from the speed swimmers, the team still has two former Intercollegiate champions in diver Jane Furness and synchronized swimmer, captain Janet Medland.

Added to the synchronized program of figures and routines are "strokes". With manager Linda Krusa, Liz Bell and Anne Ferguson backing up Janet, we should come out pretty near the top in that department. Routines have been practiced repeatedly, strokes are perfected, figures look good. So... watch out!

Two dollars gets you one they'll either win or tie for top place. Keep your eyes peeled for results, and we all wish 'em luck!

Wycliffe Wins First Title Wallop Forestry 4-1

For the second year in a row, Wycliffe and Forestry teed off in the Division II soccer championship game. This year Wycliffe emerged the victors, by a 4-1 score.

Don Cooke opened the scoring for Wycliffe early in the first half, but Dave Kil tied it up for Forestry right away. With the wind at their backs, Forestry pressed hard but there was no more scoring before half-time.

Hard checking and fast breakaways featured the second half, and Cooke scored again from close in to put his team one up. Cook quickly notched another one to complete his hat trick and Bob Haynes booted one into the left corner of the net to close out the scoring.

Forestry didn't stop trying until the final whistle, though and Wycliffe's margin was only protected by the sterling play of goalkeeper Sam Hanna. This was only the second game this year that he has been scored upon.

This was Wycliffe's best team in years. They won six of their eight games and tied another. The score sheet shows 13 for and only four tallied against. On the strength of his hat trick yesterday, Cooke was the top scorer with four goals on the year.

Hallowed Hart House Harbors A Different Type Of Boxing

By MIKE CHYKALIUK
Varsity Staff Reporter

The methodical exploration of Hart House revealed a startling discovery. Within this fine building existed a bona fide boxing gymnasium.

Here existed a facility for smashing brains in an institution where brain power is revered.

But wait, this is no ordinary gymnasium.

Where was the friendly greeting of the pugilist of the bygone days? Where was this happy vegetable whose faculties were somewhat degenerate and who seemed to exit on reflexes alone?

Where was the jovial manager, with his fragrant wearing apparel, his chrome dome, his relaxed posture, and his foul cigar? Where was this molder of champions?

Better yet, where was the champion? Absent was this elegant mesomorph identified by his horny knuckles, his hairy chest, his tattooed deltoids, his cauliflower ears and his S-shaped nose.

Indeed this champion closely resembles the chap in Piston Ring advertisements. But where were they all? Something must be seriously amiss in this place.

U of T boxing coach Tony Canzano explained it this way:

College boxing always has been a clean sport, free from the corruption of big-time boxing. In college boxing, big (10-ounce) gloves are worn instead of the six-ounce gloves used by professionals.

Every precaution is taken to safeguard the participants. Protective headgear is mandatory in both sparring and competitive sessions.

A rubber mouthpiece is used to protect the mouth and teeth. Refereeing is more rigid, resulting in fewer injuries.

Because of the big gloves, few knockouts are registered.

The bouts, using the Marquess of Queensbury rules, have been shortened to three rounds of two minutes duration each. This version of the sport is excellent for conditioning, quick thinking, and paramountly in developing self-confidence.

How about this year's prospects?

The veteran trio of Robbie Miller, Boris Petcoff and Art Vachon are the only returning title-holders. However, a strong influx of eager fighters, particularly from St. Mike's, has given Coach Canzano cause for optimism.

If fellows like Soria, Powell, Butt, McManus and Bill Brown keep improving, the Blues stand a good chance of retaining the Intercollegiate senior boxing crown.

The team has tentatively been selected, but anyone can still try for a position. Callegary bouts will be run off February 7 to determine final positions.

O, if John L. Sullivan could only see us now.

BEFUDDLED

Boxes are red, violets are blue,
I ate corn flakes for breakfast, can you skate?

OK! OK! so it doesn't make sense, will it again.

There'll be ice on the Zamboni, and feet upon the skates. There'll be turnstiles in the press box, and seats upon the tickets. Wolverines will play the trumpets. Pam Hill surely be in goal. Lil' Bar will twirl the baton, and Red will call the refs. Brigitte Bardot will be refing, and Maurice to usherette.

There'll be scholarship announcements, for all students that don't deserve them. There'll be free Cokes at the RCR, and we'll get this thing to rhyme.

And Ray Dunn will play at center. Mary had a little lamb. Angularity will be discarded, and I dunno take its place.

Cherleaders all will be heavily bearded, and wear chemise down to their knees, and the worldly Nobel peace prize will be awarded for these.

When we get ourselves un-scrumbled, what we're really trying to say.

RAF To Airlift Germany's Van

The World University Service Treasure Van program has entered the field of international politics.

According to a letter received yesterday from a WUS scholarship student in Germany by Lewis Perinbam, WUS national secretary, Van officials in Germany said the Treasure Van might break the "second Berlin blockade".

The officials had planned to hold the second annual German Treasure Van in Berlin, but were unable to transport their supplies through Russian territory, according to the student.

He said the Royal Air Force has now agreed to fly the entire Treasure Van organization into Berlin.

Meanwhile the Treasure Van on campus yesterday had what was described by Van representative Don Wilson as "a booming day". Receipts totalled $1,237 for the third day of Van sales.

Tomorrow is the last day of operation for the Van. It is open from 12-6 and 7-10 p.m.

Award Announced

Award of $1,000 to Kenneth S. McLaren of the department of hospital administration, School of Hygiene, has been announced by U of T President Claude T. Bissell.

The Robert Johnson Award is made annually to that member of the hospital administration class who at the end of his second or residency years shows the most promise of making a real contribution to the advancement of hospitals and hospital administration, the announcement said.

Mr. McLaren was recently appointed assistant professor in the hospital administration class.

RMC Stunt Punished

KINGSTON, (CUP) — Royal Military College Cadets involved in a raid on Adelaide Hall, girls' residence at Queen's University, have been severely disciplined.

Lt.-Cmdr. James G. Mills, staff adjutant and officer commanding the cadet wing, in making the announcement declined to say what punishment was inflicted.

Lt.-Cmdr. Mills said that the report of the raid in the Queen's Journal was greatly exaggerated. The Journal reported six smashed windows, a broken closet door and removal of articles from girls' rooms.

squash "intellectual elite"

Western Arquers Fare Badly Here

A University of Western Ontario team here last night to support the resolution "University education should be the prerogative of the intellectual elite" was squashed by a vote of 20-8 by the U of T team.

First speaker from Western, D'Arcy Luxton said, "If a university is open to other than the intellectual elite, then it ceases to be a university." Luxton used the controversial report of U of T president Charles T. Bissell to support his arguments. He termed the report a "manifesto".

Mike Thompson (I Trin.) of the noes, said, "You need something more in a human being than intellectual capacity. The erudite scholar with his hermit-like qualities can do nothing to help society."

Second speaker for the ayes,

Peter Brown, said "a student must not simply be trained for his job in society." He said allowing the masses into the universities would result in the lowering of academic standards, and "intellectually trained men should form the nucleus of society."

Final speaker for the opposition Malcolm Wallace (I UC) said "everyone can gain from university to some extent. It is morally wrong to deny to the mass of the people the benefits they can obtain."

The problem of women in Hart House was raised briefly. William Graham, (II Trin.) raised a point of information after a speech from the floor by Linda Silver (II UC). "I realize that women were invited to this debate," Graham said, "but does this mean that they are allowed to speak?"

Important Meeting

Varsity Editor Doug Marshall with his eternal optimism calls for the 25th consecutive time, a general masthead meeting on Sunday afternoon at 3 p.m.

Department heads will be asked to submit their usual interim reports and to make known any problems which may have arisen in the past few weeks.

The editor asks everyone to make every effort to be present at this most important meeting.

Dead Line

Some 220 entry blanks for the National Federation of Canadian University Students photography contest are unaccounted for, U of T contest chairman, Ron Carr said last night.

Of 300 blanks taken from the Students' Administrative Council office only 80 have been turned in.

Entries for the contest, which closes Dec. 1, should be handed in at the SAC Office or to the hall porter in Hart House.

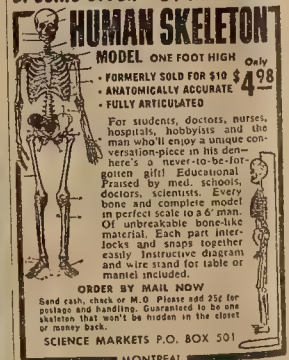

"I can't understand why no women have entered the contest," Carr said. It is the only photography contest in Canada specifically for students and the only major contest with no entry fee, he said.

300 Graduate Here At Fall Convocation

More than 300 students receiving U of T degrees or diplomas Friday heard an American scholar warn that if man's intellectual freedom is not maintained, he will lose his integrity.

Dr. John Bush, professor of English at Harvard University was addressing the annual U of T fall convocation. Dr. Bush was presented with an honorary doctorate of letters along with Dr. James Shaw, former Italian professor at the U of T by U of T President Claude T. Bissell.

Dr. Bush said, we may have less to fear from the Communist countries of the world "than from our own massive civilization."

Before the Russian earth satellite was successfully launched, he said, the teaching of the humanities was undergoing "a downward pressure exerted by dewy-eyed educationists in control."

But a revision and strengthening of education standards followed the widespread self-criticism produced by the Sputniks. The teaching of the humanities, Dr. Bush said, must be preserved and fostered by every possible means in order to offset the threat to the "inner as well as the outer" life of man resulting from mass mechanization.

The humanities, he said, are the products of the greatest individual minds of all the ages.

The responsibility to teach the humanities is "more important than ever," Dr. Bush said, as the voice of the individual is "drowned" by the levelling influences of standardization.

Calling the world's great writers "the conscience of mankind," Dr. Bush said the study of literature is the best means of saving man's intellectual life.

He concluded a knowledge of the best from the past and the present would preserve man's intellectual freedom.

Fourty-two master of arts degrees, 86 bachelorhoods of arts and 78 bachelorhoods of applied science were presented at the ceremony, along with 26 doctorates of philosophy and a number of other degrees and diplomas.

Police Hunt Safe Thieves As Culprits Grow Uneasy

By MARK NICHOLS

Toronto police said last night they still don't know who removed a 250-pound safe from the Engineering Society office early Wednesday morning.

But as the police continue in their methodical way to investigate, it is becoming very clear the theft and return the next day of a safe containing $1,300 in cash and arts students to steal the renowned Skule cannon.

At the same time it appears the students who brought the cannon, he said, that they were afraid of "ruining it."

As soon as we heard (in The Varsity) Skule's claim of money in the safe, we began planning its return," the letter says.

Meanwhile, Detectives Ronald Stirling and Charles Weir who took over investigation of the theft after anonymous calls to The Varsity revealed its location Thursday night, say they will have to continue to search for those responsible.

The safe, when found, bore the painted inscriptions, "Zorro," and "Merry Christmas."

The author of the letter concludes that there are two Skule

OTTAWA — CUP — Final irony of the month-long University of Ottawa struggle came Friday with the unanimous election of Louis Cliche—fired editor of La Rotonde—as new president of the students' council.

Cliche's election follows the resignation Thursday of former president Marcell Prud'homme after the council reversed its stand and accepted the resignations of three editors fired by the university administration Oct. 24.

Cliche, former vice-president of the council, was elected in an unruly, four-hour debate attended by 200 cheering and jeering students.

Time-table of the snow-balling Ottawa situation is as follows:

Oct. 24: Louis Cliche, Pierre Trudel and Roger Roy fired from the editorial board of La Rotonde by Rev. Leonard Ducharme, Dean of Men.

Oct. 25: Students council refuses to accept editors' resignation.

Oct. 31: Council negotiates with Father Ducharme as nationwide student support for editors grows.

Nov. 3: Canadian University Press officially condemns the firing of the editors.

Nov. 11: Students' council requests administration to re-install editors.

Nov. 19: Father Ducharme denies request for re-installation.

Nov. 27: Four-hour session of council accepts editors' resignations and Council president Marcell Prud'homme resigns.

Cliche's position will be tested Dec. 11 by a university-wide referendum.

"I accepted the post because I see in it a recognition of the principle we have been defending for the last five weeks", Cliche said last night.

Friday's debate was sparked by results of an Arts faculty referendum on the whole dispute. The results revealed "non-confidence" in the Arts council representative for voting to accept resignations submitted by the editors.

The representative has resigned. Similar referendums are being held in other faculties.

Complete reversal of the position is possible. Former president Prud'homme has indicated he would accept the job of editor of La Rotonde.

Prud'homme, who led opposition to the university's dismissal of the three editors, resigned after the council Thursday voted eight to five to accept the editors' "renouncement" of their posts.

Quebec Editor Hits Duplessis

An anti-Duplessis crusader examined democracy in Quebec Friday and found the quality rare but not quite extinct.

Gerard Filion, editor of "Le Devoir", outspoken Montreal French-language newspaper, said democracy in French Canada was an imported article, an investment from abroad.

"Like financial investments", he said it is the owner who draws the profits and is in charge.

"It is not surprising that history has made the French-Canadian of suspicious mind, not much inclined to believe in declarations of friendship, or in talk about the principles of the equality of men and of the people", he said.

Mr. Filion was addressing some 80 "Carabins", members of the exchange weekend between U of T and the University of Montreal.

Questioned about federal grants to Quebec universities, he conceded the Duplessis policy might be re-examined.

Opposition to federal grants on the constitutional grounds that they infringed on provincial control of education has been the only subject upon which Le Devoir and Duplessis have seen eye to eye.

In his address M. Filion outlined the history of democracy in Quebec. He said the French-Canadian mass has never looked upon democracy and the parliamentary regime "otherwise than as a means of defence against the English merchants, in a minority but powerful, holding executive positions and the higher civil service posts to exploit the French-Canadian habitant in a irresponsible way."

He cited the seigneurial system in the French government background and the aristocratic structure of the Catholic Church as two factors contributing to the authoritative nature of present French Government.

M. Filion also launched a barbed dart at Quebec lawyers who stray into politics.

He said lawyers acquire a "remarkable subtlety and vivacity of mind" which degenerates when they become interested in public affairs.

He said he was convinced government would become realistic and practical if we barred all lawyers from politics for one generation.

Speaking of corruption, he said he did not believe there were any more dishonest people in Quebec than there were in Ontario.

"In other places graft is carried on between four walls, with all doors closed, in Quebec the auctioning goes on in the public square."

M. Filion spoke about the theme of "The Negro King", recently expounded in Le Devoir's editorial column.

The theory draws an analogy between British colonial diplomacy and the present situation in Quebec.

Although he refused to prophesy about Quebec's future, M. Filion noted an "unaccustomed stirring" in Quebec political spheres during recent months.

One possible development was the coalition of opposition parties under one banner. He suggested the Liberal party, the Civic League and the CCF might establish a point of minimum departure by backing a program for a democratic system in Quebec.

Snowwalks...

Trinity students last night hung a four-foot wide model Sputnik above the Hoskin Ave. cross-walk in front of the college.

The Sputnik, made of hula-hoops, newspapers and tin-foil was the focal point of Trinity Athletic Dance decorations Friday.

Students who hung up the model said that they were protesting the fact that snow had covered the "X's" warning drivers about the cross-walk.

"This is to show Metro Council they should have installed flashing beacons at crosswalks," one of the students said last night.

Checked Coats

SHARE Surging with $18

The Share campaign gets off to a roaring start today with $18 already in the treasury.

A coat-checking concession at Friday night's Victoria College Scarlet and Gold netted the campaign $18.35.

Today dates with college and faculty cheerleaders will be auctioned off for Share during lunch hour at University College, Trinity College and the medical students' coffee shop.

The girls will be introduced through a five-minute skit directed by Vic's John Rumble. The show will travel to all major faculties and colleges during the week, Rumble said last night. Sue Evans, World University Service chairman, said last night campaign prospects look good so far.

"If Treasure Van is any indication of how well the campus is supporting WUS functions, then I'm hoping Share will be an unparalleled success," she said.

Campaign proceeds go into WUS funds to aid needy students in under-privileged countries. About $5,000 will be used by WUS of Canada to support five special WUS projects in Israel, Vietnam, Japan, Egypt and India.

Treasure Van officials last night said they were "more than pleased" with a grand sale total of $5,250. Proceeds were up more than $1,000 over last year's total. Heavy snowstorms caused slack sales Friday. Records had been broken for every previous day of sales.

"We made more money in spite of the weather and the change of location," Van official Penny Renne said last night.

"We did far better than we had expected," she said.

Offer Alternative To Toronto Plan

ST. JOHN'S. — CUP — A University president has expressed grave doubts about the tuition plan suggested by a special University of Toronto committee on student aid.

Dr. Raymond Gushue, president of Memorial University has suggested a system of university entrance scholarships, bursaries and student loans as an alternative to the Toronto plan of providing free university education to first-class high school students.

"I am not convinced," Dr. Gushue said, "of the benefits of free university tuition even with students of high calibre."

He said he was convinced that a system of loans enabling students to attend college would be more useful than the free education scheme proposed in Toronto.

"After graduation and after (the student) had obtained work in the field he had specialized in, the student would then repay the loan so that another student would have the same opportunity as he had," he said.

Prof. Grube Will Speak

Ancient oratory will get a going over at St. Mike's tomorrow.

Sponsored by the SMC Students' Administrative Council and the Senate Club, Prof. G. M. A. Grube will give a public lecture on "Oratory as an Influence on Ancient Literature."

The talk is planned as the first of a three-part series. SMC SAC president Mike McCabe said last night. Other lectures will concern medieval and modern oratory.

Prof. Grube is "the expert on this subject at U of T," McCabe said.

The lecture will begin at 7.30 p.m. in the Carr Hall auditorium.

Theocrats Take Wycliffe Vote Favored Confederates Downed

A newly-formed Theocratic Party swept to power in a special Wycliffe College Literary Society election Friday.

Beat out in the election was another new party, the Confederates, who college sources said had been favoured to win.

Election results were announced at Friday's evening meal by Governor-General Charles Ledger, who said he hoped the new government would bring college student government back into line for the rest of the year.

Ninety per cent. of the college voted in the election, which followed dissolution of the House by Ledger earlier in November.

Ledger ordered the dissolution of the Wycliffe Lit after the resignation of the Elizabethan Party Continued Nov. 13. The EPC was the third party to be overthrown this year by a motion of non-confidence.

The Theocratic cabinet will include the following: Prime Minister, Bob Wilkinson (IV SPS); Deputy PM, Charles Beck (II UC); Minister of Justice, Warren Herron (II Theol); Minister of Foreign Affairs, John Vint (IV SPS);

Minister of Education (I Theol); Minister of Internal Affairs, Bill Ellis (II Dents); Secretary of State, David Peasgood (II UC); Keeper of the Seal, Merv Everall (II UC) and Minister Without Portfolio, Ron Steers (II UC).

Leader of the Opposition is James Merry (I Theol).

Saskatchewan Students To Check Book Prices

SASKATOON, (CUP) — For the first time in Canada a university students' council is conducting a nationwide survey of university text-book prices.

The University of Saskatchewan's students' council has formed a committee headed by engineering president Bill Ness to prepare a list of all texts used on the U of S campus.

The committee also plans to send letters to 13 other Canadian universities asking for similar lists and to all text-book publishers requesting wholesale prices and suggested university selling prices. Prices of drafting sets, slide rules and other technical equipment will also be investigated.

Ness said he will notify the presidents of the engineering faculties in the 13 universities being contacted.

He said the survey is to determine whether students are paying fair prices for text books.

"If, after the results are tabulated, we find students are being overcharged, we will request the students' council to take action in bringing about fair prices," Ness said.

peace of mind

Early last Wednesday, students of this University broke into the offices of the Engineering Society, dropped a 250-pound safe out the window and made off with it.

It was quite an accomplishment. The students who achieved it showed vast skill in their second-storey work; they were professional enough to have put the Toronto police on their trail and to make themselves eligible for charges of grand larceny.

The safe they stole and returned next day happened to contain $1,300.

Unable now to contain their pride, the culprits seem compulsively bent on boasting of their skill.

They have delivered a letter to The Varsity. In it they claim the Skule Cannon they sought was actually in the safe they took.

This is not relevant.

Nor is it relevant now to argue the pros and cons of student pranks.

The Varsity, as usual, is in the awkward position of knowing too much.

We know now the college and residence in which the plan was hatched. We could know, if we chose, the names of some of the students involved. We know what plan of action the students are considering taking, and we have talked to a representative of the band who we could trace if we so desired.

At the moment, the police are looking for these same individuals.

If the students concerned are so interested in making themselves known, we earnestly suggest they go to the police.

And, if they lack the courage to do this, we suggest they stop boasting about the matter. M.N.

in our time

Winston Churchill celebrated his 84th birthday yesterday.

Two feelings are mixed in any birthday greetings we may extend to him; a tremendous gratitude for his kind of leadership and the hope that his kind of leadership may be obsolete.

It is perhaps not irreverent to find the basic characteristic of Churchillian diplomacy in stubbornness.

It was a stubbornness that was at its finest in his unyielding opposition to Nazism and at its least noble in his equally unyielding opposition to Indian independence.

Had Churchill been less stubborn, had he had more of the "liberal" preoccupation with seeing every side of every issue we might not be free or alive to write critical editorials today.

But we have much less justification for being secure in our righteousness today than Churchill had in 1939.

Neville Chamberlain is usually cast opposite Churchill as the villain of the Second World War. But perhaps the diplomacy for today is a combination of the best parts of the two men.

We still need the Churchillian vision that some principles must never be given up. But, in spite of the fact that "appeasement" is still a nasty word, we also need the spirit that took Chamberlain to Munich with the naive optimism that those principles could be sustained over a council table rather than on the battlefield. Modern Quebec and

The Negro King Theory

Gerard Filion, crusading editor of the Montreal French-language newspaper Le Devoir, is one of Quebec Premier Maurice Duplessis' most consistent opponents. Below is a section of an address he made Friday to members of the Carabin Weekend.

This leads me to develop before you a theme which the Editor-in-Chief of Le Devoir has treated with some spirit in three editorial articles: the theory of the negro ruler.

Following the scandal raised by the purchase of shares of the Quebec Natural Gas Corporation by members of the Duplessis Cabinet, Mr. André Laurendeau sought for an explanation of the almost complete silence of the English-language press of Quebec Province. The scandal was much more spectacular than that of the Trans-Canada Pipe Line. Nevertheless, the Montreal Star and the Montreal Gazette treated the matter with a reticence, I might even say, with an uneasiness which at least was odd.

"The English-language newspapers of Quebec," wrote Mr. Laurendeau, "act like the British in an African Colony."

The British have political sense, they rarely destroy the political institutions of a conquered country. They surround the negro king; but they hand over to him some fancied advantages. On occasion, they allow him to chop off some heads; that is a custom of the country. One thing never enters their mind, and that is to demand that a negro king should conform to the high moral and political standards of the British.

The negro king must be made to collaborate with and protect the interests of the British. Once this collaboration is assured, the rest is of less importance. Does this petty king violate the rules of democracy? What more could be expected from an aborigine?

I do not ascribe these sentiments to the English minority of Quebec. But things take place as if some of their leaders believe in the theory and practice of the negro king. They make excuses for Mr. Duplessis, leader of the natives in the Quebec state, which they would not tolerate in one of their own.

The result is a recession of democracy and of parliamentarism, a further uncontested reign of arbitrary acts, a constant collusion of Anglo-Quebec finance with what is most rotten in the politics of this province."

More recently, Mr. Laurendeau returned to the same idea to develop it further.

"The British, he wrote on November 18th, have parliamentary democracy in their blood. They respect it up to what seems to us exaggerated points. Doubtless they have, like all nations, their shacks, their candidates for dictatorship; but the average man by habit knows how to protect himself against these dangers, at least in the sphere of politics. There are some faults which British democrats find hard to pardon, even in the leaders they like and respect; those who in particular endeavour to reduce parliamentary liberties.

This hypersensitivity to abuse of power is to be found in Anglo-Canada; it is one of the elements of a civic spirit which we freely recognize is more constant than ours, even if it happens to suffer eclipses in certain Canadian provinces. For example, when during the course of a parliamentary debate, the speaker of the majority imposes silence on the minority, it is resented as a scandal.

Now these reflexes are not in play, or if so, they are very weak among the English of Quebec, when it is a case of judging Quebec politics. And this goes for the leaders of English speaking opinion. There is reaction at an abuse of power on condition that there has been notice of it; and the English-language press of Quebec speaks about it as little as possible. It might be said, for itself and for the economic forces of which it is the expression, that the essential thing is to create as few frictions as possible with the Government.

For here we have an astonishing thing. Read the English-language press of the rest of the country: when by chance it is interested in Quebec, it is rarely to praise Mr. Duplessis. Go around a bit in the other provinces; Duplessism will be painted for you in a picture so anti-pathetic and often so far-fetched that you will be surprised to hear yourself making some corrections, re-establishing some of the facts, pointing out that no, things are not going that badly in the Province of Quebec, that freedom is not trampled underfoot to that extent, that Mr. Duplessis is no Fascist.

The other surprise is to have to tell your questioners: this regime which seems to you to be so absolutely anti-democratic, is attacked as little as possible by the Quebec English-language newspapers. They even defend it; and they even boost it. They are in all cases, or in nearly all cases, the enemies of the adversaries of Mr. Duplessis.

Boston society exposé fine comedy

The Late George Apley, by John P. Marquand and George S. Kaufman, is one of those rare simple and unpretentious comedies which make all the frenetically-paced farces so prevalent in the States today seem just a lot of sound and fury.

As such, one can find no more quarrel with a comedy of this kind than one can find with the other major creations of this genre — Life With Father and Ah, Wilderness! True, Kaufman seems at times to let his particular brand of breezy brash humour get the upper hand (sample: "How long has Wilson been working for us?" "Eighteen years." "Hmmm. He's due for a raise."), but generally the comedy is fresh and simple.

Some people might be surprised at Robert Gill's choice of this play for a Hart House production, but in the light of the sophisticated and polished performance he has given us, such an objection could only be very slight.

Gary Plaxton is a fortunate choice for Apley. Playing a role which must be utterly devoid of humor in order to be humorous, he presented a character at once very real and very likeable.

Molly Palmer as his wife, may tend to be too reserved in the part, but invests the role with tremendous dignity and charm. Vals Echin as the daughter who finally breaks away, is excellent; the fault is not hers that we rarely get to sympathise with her. She, like cousin Jane (delightfully played by Marie-laine Douglas), and Roger Newcombe (a fine portrayal by James Garrow), never come across as fully rounded characters, and one always wishes that the authors had given them lots more to do in the play.

Other bright moments in the play were provided by Jayne Ford as the shrewish sister, and by James Cunningham, who presented a devastating portrait of a pompous ass, giving an additional humorous coloring to the line that he was "the man Mr. Freud wrote his book all about."

Robert Graham, a newcomer to Hart House audiences, gave a very sincere and very moving performance as the son who cannot quite escape from the Boston environment. In particular, his transition from an awkward youth to a stuffy tintype of his father in the epilogue, was extremely well carried off.

A simple but effective set and well-paced direction by Robert Gill were not the least of this production's charms. And a good time was had by all.

Warren Wilson

cold war blob

The Blob is a film of misunderstanding. The police misunderstand the juvenile delinquents, the juvenile delinquents misunderstand their parents and themselves; everyone misunderstands the strange visitor from another planet; and the Toronto film critics have misunderstood the whole movie.

The misunderstanding arises from considering The Blob as a horror movie. A simple glance at this unusual picture should be enough to convince anyone of the falsity of this conception. It is an anti-Red propaganda film, pure and simple.

This thesis derives not merely from the fact that the blob itself is red in color—that would be too simple; no, it is far more than that. For the blob's progress throughout this film parallels almost exactly the events that have taken place in Communist Russia since the revolution.

The first victim the creeping red menace sucks in (literally) is a peasant, a lonely farmer in the back-country. Next, men of science (in the person of a doctor and his nurse) join the swelling ranks in the amorphous mass. Having consolidated its position, the creature next attempts to make the switch from an agricultural power to an industrial one; so, naturally, its next victim is a mechanic.

Next, the blob attempts to compete with America on an economic basis, there follows that amazing and very meaningful scene in the supermarket, where the creature tries to enlist two unwilling young converts, and finds itself balked by the cold war in the meat refrigerators. As is the case in Russian history, when met with defeat in one sphere, the blob turns its attention to other objectives.

It attacks America on a cultural level by oozing into a movie house, which, appropriately enough, is showing feathery horror movies, and massacres thousands. It is almost successful. But America effectively wins the latest phase of the cold war by neutralizing the poor creature with CO₂—cold air, instead of the more temperate variety they have been so recently exhibiting.

In a remarkable closing shot, we see the blob being dropped somewhere in the Arctic circle, perhaps an indication of a new isolationist period in American foreign policy.

After seeing this film, one is left with the rather disturbing thought that is an appalling lack of compassion in the world today.

Lisa della Casa, the beautiful soprano, who is a star of the Metropolitan and a reigning prima donna of the Vienna State Opera, will be appearing here in Toronto tonight to give a recital at the Eaton Auditorium.

Hamlet in Purposeful Joint

Michael Benthall's production of Hamlet, which was presented by the Old Vic at the Royal Alex on Saturday, was a deliberate representation of the thought, tensions and wonder found in Shakespeare's success. This general atmosphere of deliberateness, with especial emphasis on the questioning and interrogative mood, covered the interpretation of characters, the 'problems' in Hamlet, and even the cutting. Likewise the production was fringed by this deliberateness.

This awareness of motives gave the production a strong mark of being an intellectual work and a drama, with a slight falling away on the poetic side. The first scene was notable for this quality. The important words were hit hard and lingered over. The pace was retained by cutting and a certain ingrained sense of conflict. Olivier Neville's Claudius was a superb example of this measured tension.

The production stressed the ideas of Action (and what is an act?) and Reality, although never with the feeling that anything else was being spared. The emphasis on the activity of the Court in the Coronation scene, of the players upon their arrival, indeed of all the characters, was lavishly insisted upon by the richness of the costume period, and the gorgeous aspect of the staging. This immediacy (or perhaps remnant of Brecht's living theatre) was seen in the Hamlet-Claudius interview after the slaying of Polonius, where the whole court has their madman under control with drawn swords.

As all good students of Dover Wilson, Maynard Moek and other worthy critics know, "Hamlet" abounds with 'problems' such as the Ghost, Hamlet's Antic Disposition, the Mousetrap sequence etc. Michael Benthall's stress on the question of Reality and Illusion is pointed out by an exceedingly nice insight into Ophelia's mad scene. Barbara Jefford, as fallen as all Ophelia's are, played her last scenes in a dark, tattered gown, which reminded us of a 'Nevermore' ambiguity found in Poe heroines. Mr. Benthall, anticipating her madness from Hamlet's denunciation during the Nunnery speech scene, brought Ophelia from a charming mature thing to a mad woman, whose manner was a prostitute's, and words those of a lady with a purpose. The emphasis on Ophelia's acquiescence to her father's view of convention, and her loss of truth to herself above all, made Ophelia's relationship to the Old Vic's "Hamlet" what it should be, a question of discerning honesty.

The matter with "Hamlet" is unfortunately John Neville. Any real falling off must be laid at his inability to be great. We too often felt that Mr. Neville was holding up the mirror to observe his own posturing rather than to illuminate the audience. Although the rest of the production seemed to have their activity in order, indeed we felt Mr. Benthall might, in desperation, have put this very purposeful court around him. Mr. Neville flung wide of the mark on numerous occasions. His first soliloquy was spent carefully scrutinizing the orchestra audience, and his exits after his return from England were still as unrestrained as those of an earlier Hamlet. Even so, we felt Hamlet's great university in Neville. The director seemed obviously to have stressed this characteristic, even to the extent that Hamlet was in love with literally everyone, excluding Claudius. Although excellent at times (for instance in the Queen's Closet scene) Mr. Neville's Hamlet was not the unifying force that it should be; rather the play itself, and the director gave the unity. It was very good.

Alison Cunningham

Foremost Interpreter of Lieder Today

Aksel Schiotz, the famous Danish baritone (here pictured on the right) is at present bringing his world-renowned interpretation of Lieder to the Royal Conservatory of Music here in Toronto.

Since his arrival in the North American continent four years ago, Mr. Schiotz has given recitals all over the continent (including several trips back to Europe, where he is so popular, and always in demand), and at the same time he has taught Lieder at the University of Minnesota, at the University of British Columbia and now has been invited to set up a school for Lieder at the Royal Conservatory, where the post has been specially created for him.

Born in Denmark in 1906, Mr. Schiotz has sung with the Royal Opera of Copenhagen, Glyndebourne and Benjamin Britten's English Opera Group, and has given recitals at the great international music festivals, such as Edinburgh. He was knighted by the King of Denmark for his great contribution as a "national singer."

His interpretations of Schubert, Hugo Wolf and Schumann remain unparalleled, and those who have so far only had the pleasure of hearing his recordings will have the privilege of hearing his recital on Friday evening, December 5th, at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

Chamber Music—Perfection

The Vienna Octet, during its recent concert at Eaton Auditorium, closely approached the artistic ideal of chamber music. The program consisted of Mozart's Divertimento no. 10 in F Major, and Schubert's Octet in F major, op. 166.

Mozart's Divertimento may proudly stand as one of the finest examples of late eighteenth century classicism. In its plastic clarity, refined grace and dynamic but disciplined form, it manifests the essential qualities of this era. The octet had an innate sense for the meaning and spirit of this work. The whole was permeated by the gaiety and warmth of Viennese music. To mention a only a few aspects, such as the depth of expression of rich melodic interpretation, the artists did full justice to the composition.

The Divertimento of Schubert, while inheriting much from the Viennese school, also reveals the new tendencies of Romanticism. Instant changes of pace and mood, a propensity for length, orchestral color, and moments of extreme tension signify the Romantic trend. The autonomy of the violin is replaced by a more democratic treatment of the instruments in this work. Especially noteworthy was the clarinet and first violin duet in the Andante, the warm tone of the cello in the fourth variation, and the thoughtful handling of the Double Bass in the opening Allegro.

The delightfully impish encore was a final witness to the real vitality of music. The Vienna Octet serves as an admirable example of the perfection of our art.

Varsity Girls Swim Champs

KINGSTON, Nov. 29 — Tabulated results of a two-day meet saw Toronto claim first place in the 1958 Intercollegiate Swimming meet here today. Captain Janet Medland and sprinter Valerie Lewis both took two firsts. This is the first time Toronto has won the meet since '53 when Val's sister, Beryl, was swimming for Varsity in her last year.

In Friday evening's diving competition, Jane Furness, the fourth of seven divers, absolutely awed the audience with her first compulsory dive, a jack-knife. She and Pauline McCullagh of McGill were obviously the focus of all attention throughout the remaining four dives.

Miss Furness had a slight edge on each dive, until her last optional dive, a forward somersault in pike position. Although beautifully executed, she missed her entry. This left the judges faced with a tie in points. In such an instance, Hoyle says the first place goes to the diver with the highest points in the compulsory dives—obviously Jane Furness of Toronto,

By PAM HILL
Varsity Staff Reporter

Pauline McCullagh again loomed into the picture — this time in the role of an "Indian Maid." But Janet Medland, presenting "A Study in Jazz," illustrated the real art of synchronized swimming.

Her movement and timing were symmetrical with the music; her talent was obviously superior. At one point, Miss Medland was submerged for nearly a minute, with only her neatly-pointed toes performing above the surface — an underwater triumph in all. Again the movements illustrated the music, reminding one of both the modern dance and the traditional blues.

The points in the solo routines were 334 for Pauline McCullagh, and 340 for Janet Medland of Toronto.

Saturday saw the speed competition.

Toronto seemed to pull a real hat-trick with Val Lewis. Western had their top-seeded swimmers, Cathy McBrien and Bev Eynon, against her in the 100-yard freestyle and the 75-yard individual medley, respectively. Both were good pacers for Val, but in the 100 yard free, that was all. When she finished, she was several body lengths ahead of Cathy, and her time was 1:07.1.

The 75-yard individual medley was the race of the afternoon. In the first 25 yards butterfly, Val was slightly ahead, but Bev Eynon made up the short distance in the length of backstroke. Coming out of a flip turn into the freestyle, both were even and at the end, it looked like a tie. Official time clocked Bev Eynon at 52.5, and Val Lewis of Toronto at 52.4.

Bev Westman also took a first for the Blue and White in the 50-yard orthodox breast stroke at 42 seconds flat, another close race — as was the final event, a 200-yard freestyle relay, in which Toronto placed second. Another second also went to Gail Royce in the 50-yard freestyle, timed at 32.2, half a second behind Queen's. In sum, a great week-end! Much good food, much laughter, little sleep, new friends, much swimming, new enemies! Great meet! Oh — totals? Toronto: 43; Western: 35; McGill and Queen's: 31.

HONOR DAVE STEPHEN TONIGHT

Play UofM Wolverines In Exhibition Contest

Pay Special Tribute To The Old Redhead

By GENE GLISKY

Associate Sports Editor

For ten years now, International Intercollegiate hockey, as an organized league, has been extinct.

Occasional visits by Toronto to the neighbors southward resulted in some sporadic competition, while American teams seldom came to display their talents at Varsity Arena.

Tonight at 8, precedent may either be established or broken, take it as you will. The University of Michigan Wolverines play the Varsity Blues in an exhibition tilt.

Through the years Toronto and Michigan have been familiar opponents. They have faced off 24 times: Varsity won 11, Michigan 10, with three games tied.

Although riddled by injuries to several key men, Wolverines are fielding a strong club.

Michigan coach Alan Renfrew, has had an outstanding and colorful career in American college hockey. Trailing from Toronto, he is in his sophomore year as coach of the Wolverines.

Wolverines were NCAA champions in 1956-57, and were finalists last season.

Backbone of Michigan defensively, will be goalie Ross Childs, who occasionally alternates as a defenseman as well.

Lanky left-winger Pat Cushing of Sudbury and also St. Michaels College Majors will be worth watching. The high-scoring forward rapped in two goals against the Detroit Red Wings in an exhibition game last year.

Centre Dale Macdonald of Saskatoon, and left-winger Ralph Horner of North Bay, are stand-out performers with the Michigan squad.

Teaming up as a rugged and experienced defence unit will be Barrie Hayton and Bobbie Watt. Watt hails from Barrie.

Although Varsity Blues made us eat our words slightly, by dropping their first game against Laval, at least the performance of the Bill Kennedy-Dunc Brodie-Howie Roth line was highly encouraging.

The Mike Elik-Grant Mills-John Macdonald contingent potted five goals, while Dave Stephen leads Blues' defensemen with four points, on a goal and three assists.

Dave (Red) Stephen will undoubtedly be in action both during the game, and as the intra-period star.

There is no doubt Blues will be "up" for tonight's clash. With the realization of strong competition in their own league, and the pressure of pre-season predictions, losses will rattle.

With no intent to strain international relations, Blues, sports-writers, and fans alike would wish another win.

PRESENTATION CEREMONIES

Following the first period of tonight's hockey game between Varsity Blues and University of Michigan Wolverines, a series of presentations will be made to Dave (Red) Stephen.

These will come after official presentation of the Queen's Cup, emblematic of Intercollegiate hockey supremacy, to Varsity captain Mike Elik by University of Toronto athletic director Warren Stevens.

Mr. Stevens will present Red with a suitably-engraved replica of the Queen's Cup.

Al Cecutti will present Red with an honor award from the Faculty of Medicine.

John Macdonald will present Red with a gift from the players, coach and manager of this year's hockey team.

By JOHN BROOKS

Varsity Sports Editor

A good athlete has many qualities.

Sportsmanship, desire, ability, color—these are just a few. The athlete who can rest his character on them is indeed fortunate.

One such individual is Dave "Red" Stephen.

Tonight, following the first period of the Varsity-Michigan exhibition game, he will be accorded the honor due him in his eighth and final year with the hockey Blues.

It is recognition truly deserved.

In the fall of 1951, a young, red-thatched hockey player, fresh from action with Ayr Raiders of the Scottish Hockey League, entered the Physical and Health Education course at this institution.

Two months later, he donned his first pair of University of Toronto skates, and wrote the preface to what was to be a long and sparkling career in intercollegiate play.

In league games, he has scored 20 goals and assisted on 69 more. His finest single effort was three goals and two assists in the 1955 league opener.

Now 28, Red prepares to write the final chapter.

His has been neither a short nor a simple contribution. For there is much more to Dave Stephen than sweater No. 8 skating near the Varsity blue-line.

There is the ever cheerful grin and greeting when paths cross on the campus; there is the never-ending string of jokes in the dressing room; and there is that moment of seriousness when a difficult task is to be accomplished.

And there is the fine ability which has endeared Red to his coaches as a valuable competitor, and to his fans as a colorful and entertaining hockey player.

Stick-handler deluxe, Red has left many an opposition player twisted like a soggy pretzel with his wizardrous puck control.

Here today, gone tomorrow, Dave Stephen has cast a solid impression on Varsity hockey annals of the 1950's. He will not soon be forgotten.

Blues Lose, Win In Openers

Special to The Varsity

MONTREAL, P.Q., Nov. 30—University of Toronto Blues bounced back from a 7-5 loss to Laval Friday night to whip McGill Redmen, 11-3, here last night and tie Rouge et Or for first place in the Intercollegiate League.

Blues' forward trio of Bill Kennedy, Howie Roth and Dunc Brodie paced the attack in both games, picking up a total of seven goals and 10 assists. Roth and Kennedy each had three goals.

Varsity played below par against Laval, allowing the hosts five consecutive tallies after taking a 2-0 lead in the first period. Ray Dunn, in the Blues' goal, kicked out 23 shots, while Varsity fired 37 at Rouge et Or netminder Jacques Lebrun.

Last night, Blues came up against a weaker McGill team, and burst out for 10 goals in the final two periods after being held to a 1-1 tie after 20 minutes.

Bob Giroux, in the Varsity nets, stopped 17 of the 20 shots fired at him, while Blues submerged Redmen goalie Alex Herron with 55 shots.

Toronto played the second game without veteran defenseman Neil Munro, who received word shortly before game time that his mother had died in Regina.

Both games were fairly rough, with the officials experiencing some difficulty in abiding by the new international rules.

Play was held up for 15 minutes in the first period of the Laval game, when the lights went out and players had to catch and kill a live rat thrown on the ice by an over-exuberant Frenchman.

Liberals Without Chief As Sick Leader Quits

Campus Liberals get together Wednesday to elect a new Liberal Club president.

Jim Doris, IV SMC, tendered his resignation Saturday as club president on doctor's orders.

"The doctor has left me practically no alternative but to resign from the position," Doris said last night. He is still suffering from the after-effects of a recent attack of pneumonia.

Doris said three club members have already unofficially thrown their hats into the election ring. There will be no formal nominations, and he will not throw his support behind any one candidate, he said.

"I am confident of a sweeping victory for Liberals on campus in the Model Parliament ahead," Doris said. He will remain an active member of the club, he said.

The election is scheduled for Wednesday at 4 p.m. in the Economics building.

Date Set For Annual SAC - Varsity Contest

Formal arrangements have been completed for the annual Students' Administrative Council-Varsity hockey game.

Initiated last year to relieve pressure building up between the council and the paper, the game will be continued as a tradition in remembrance of 1957-58.

Varsity editor Doug Marshall accepted a private challenge and presented the proposal to the SAC last night.

University College rep Marv Katzman responded for the SAC

"with both a sarcastic sneer and a confident glare" on whatever terms The Varsity demands.

Tentative date for the game, held in Varsity Arena, has been set as Jan. 30, Winter Carnival Friday.

A report on the game by last year's SAC recommended admission be charged to help defray costs of the SAC-Varsity party which follows.

Expenses for last year's party included an "incidental" of $35.

hart house service ...

A "Disturber," A Message

By HARVEY SHEPHERD
Varsity News Editor

Where there had been four tall silver candlesticks and an ornate crucifix during a Catholic service there were yesterday two little candles and a bare wooden cross.

Where the president of St. Michael's college had raised his white head and said the church is the home of God and the gate of Heaven, a small brunette woman stood in a white blouse and a plain black gown and hinted there may be a few things the church is forgetting.

Yesterday's service in an almost unadorned Hart House Great Hall was Protestant. The minister was Dr. Ellen Flesseman of the University of Leyden, Holland, graduate of the University of Amsterdam and of the Union Theological Seminary, New York.

Rev. Jim Cunningham, Hart House chaplain, says she stands for the same thing as the Student Christian Movement at its best. She is a "disturber."

You find the hymns to sing by number in a hymn-book. The confession is something you read from the printed order of service (Congregation Seated).

"And grant, O most merciful Father, for his sake, That we may hereafter live a godly, righteous and sober life, To the glory of thy holy Name. Amen."

But she read about John the Baptist, the prophet crying in the wilderness, in ecstatic praise of the Messiah, unworthy to tie His sandals, almost refusing to baptise his Lord for sheer adoration.

Then she read about the same John, unhappy in prison, doubting, sending to discover if Christ was indeed the Messiah.

And Dr. Flesseman, delivering her sermon, asked why. Perhaps, she said, it was because he had expected the kingdom on Earth.

After all, she said, the Messiah didn't have that much to show for His stay on Earth. A few blind saw, a few sick were healed, but there were a great many left blind or sick. A few dead were raised, but they would soon die again.

These were signs of what was to come.

And what John remembered and maybe we are forgetting is that these things are to come.

The Kingdom of Heaven is two things, she said. It is in the hearts of men and to some, at least, that Kingdom is here now.

But it is also to come to Earth someday. "Thy will be done on Earth." "Maybe soon," she said, "I don't know."

Committee's Report Is Canada's Need

The Advisory Committee report on student aid yesterday was called a Canadian answer to a Canadian problem by one of its creators.

Speaking to Toronto's Canadian Club blanch, U of T Vice-president Murray Ross said "We were conscious of the Soviet challenge, yet we thought of the matter as a Canadian problem and we sought a Canadian answer."

Speaking of the threat of government control of education, Dr. Ross said "I am convinced that a combination of private giving, corporate giving, and government subsidies can keep our universities free and our scholarship and research at a high level — although all of it will have to be on a scale far beyond anything hitherto considered in Canada."

The survival of Western democracy may well depend on our ability to see the necessity of such action and our willingness to respond freely to the need.

An ideal educational system would provide high academic standards, encouragement for outstanding students to continue their education, motivation for good studies, and leisure for assimilation and reflection, Dr. Ross said.

The qualities we seek are:

subtle and fragile. We want creativity, greatness and uniqueness and we know these cannot be forced," he said.

The Advisory Committee thinks "the influence of this plan will reach well down into the high school and that the incentive to do first class work throughout the educational system will be considerable," he said.

"Ours is not a society that can be static and survive. There is a built-in dynamism that requires that we strive constantly to improve conditions not only for ourselves but for all members in the community," he said.

Amends Constitution Of Model Parliament

Opposition amendments to Model Parliament Government bills will have to be submitted four days in advance this year, the UTDU Model Parliament Committee decided this afternoon. Government bills must be in one week in advance.

Apart from these changes the Model Parliament constitution will be substantially the same as last year.

UC Votes Down New Bissell Plan

University College students yesterday turned thumbs down on the report of President Claude T. Bissell's advisory planning board.

A vote of 19-14 in the UC Parliament overthrew the resolution "resolved that this house endorses the Bissell plan for university education".

The first speaker for the government, Ken Wyman, III UC, requested the board's report, commonly known as the "Bissell plan", be called the "Ross Report".

"The proposals concerning the changing of the academic year are designed to improve the education of our better students, and in this it succeeds," he said.

The lead-off speaker for the Opposition, Jay Waterman (II UC) said the Bissell plan should not be renamed because "a skunk called by any other name smells just as sweet.

"We all approve of the plan's recommendations that first class students should not be forced to pay for their studies, but a so-called 'deserving' student should not have to get 75 per cent," Waterman said.

"There is a danger of creating an intellectual elite which may gain control of society. To solve this problem we must confine nuclear tests to mutate our species and thereby produce a race of idiots and only a few geniuses to go to university," he said.

The second speaker for the government, Marv Catzman (IV UC) referring to the appearance of Students' Administrative Council president Vince Kelly on television, said, "According to Kelly 'one of the great virtues of this plan is to provide incentive for B' and C level students. We feel this is a plan for further study, not for immediate action.'"

Max Rotstein (IIFUC) second speaker for the Opposition said, "If this plan is effected it will create a rat-race to get A's."

"In its present form, the bureaucracy is both degrading and embarrassing. There is no assurance that the new form will be any different. To quote Karl Marx, 'the path to Hell is paved with good intentions.'"

Staff Trustees In Sane Sunday Out

Two U of T staff members were swept into seats on the Toronto Board of Education in yesterday's civic elections but a candidate for the Board of Control who was backed by a university action group went down to defeat.

Assistant Professor Robin S. Harris of the University College English Department was returned as a Board Trustee in Ward 2 and Athletic Association accountant Keele S. Gregory was elected to a Board of Education post representing Ward 4.

Prof. Harris piled up nearly 4,700 votes and topped his closest rival, Mrs. Evalene Barker by more than 1,000 votes while Mr. Gregory, who finished 1,200 votes behind poll-heading J. Sydney Midanik, gained a margin of 400 votes on the third-place candidate.

James Karfilis failed in his bid for one of four Board of Control seats, finishing seventh in a field of 11 candidates.

Karfilis gained about 11,000 votes campaigning for a "brighter, happier Sunday."

Karfilis, who received the Support of the Student Action Group for a Sane Sunday in his campaign, promised, if elected, revision of the "antiquated law which forbids Sunday paid performances of a symphony concert, ballet, play or motion picture."

Pierre Leduc, leader of the Students' Action League which supported Mr. Karfilis because of his more open Sunday stand, last night said the group was "disappointed" at Mr. Karfilis' failure to secure a controller's seat.

"We had this idea for a brighter Sunday," Leduc said, "Mr. Karfilis had the same idea."

Leduc said he thought perhaps there were many people over 21 in Toronto who were ineligible to vote in the election and would have supported a brighter Sunday had they been able.

In the municipal election, a referendum on the very question of whether all citizens over 21 in Toronto should be granted municipal voting rights was carried by a vote of about three to one.

Share Campaign Is Well-organized

Share's giant thermometer outside the Students' Administrative Council office hovered at zero yesterday as the Share campaign moved into its second day of canvassing.

But Sue Evans, World University Service Chairman, was enthusiastic about the campaign.

Canvassers at St. Mike's, Victoria College, Engineering and Medicine are well-organized and doing well, Miss Evans said.

John Rumble's travelling cheerleader auction was a big success at University College, Trinity and the Arbor Room, although proceeds from the sale of dates with cheerleaders was low.

"We didn't expect much money from the auction, and think it succeeded in making people aware of Share," Miss Evans said.

Canvassers at the Faculty of Medicine announced last night they will donate all medical campaign proceeds to a special WUS medical project in either Vietnam, Egypt or India.

The Meds men join Engineers and Hillel in earmarking their funds for a special project.

Engineers will sponsor a foreign engineering scholar's year of studies at U of T. Hillel will campaign for a special project in Israel.

John Rumble said last night he is "very grateful" for the help he has received from cheerleaders on Vic, Trinity, SMC, UC and Varsity cheerleading squads.

The skit-auction for Share will travel to Vic and SMC tomorrow, and Meds and Nursing Wednesday, he said.

Miss Evans appealed to faculty and college reps to hand in their proceeds to the SAC office tomorrow so that accurate tabulations of campaign returns to date can be made.

December 15

Directory Date

The U of T students' directory for 1958-59 should be out by Dec. 15, J. P. Stewart, Assistant Registrar, said yesterday.

This will be the first time the book has been tabulated by an International Business Machines machine, he said.

The new procedure is still being ironed out, he said, but no serious hitches have developed.

The book contains the telephone numbers and addresses of all the students in all faculties of the university — and has been called the "Hustler's Handbook."

With the new IBM tabulation, Mr. Stewart said, there is "hope" the annual directory will become available within a month or two of registration in a year or two.

On the other hand, he said, there is a feeling this would make the book less reliable as many students have not settled down in one location within a month of registration.

CCFer's Convene

To Prepare Planks To Hear 'Challenge'

The campus CCF party will hold its annual campus convention tomorrow to thrash out a Model Parliament campaign platform in two three-hour open sessions in Trinity's large Convocation Hall. Campus CCFers will also hear Ontario CCF leader Donald MacDonald score the standards and symptoms of today's affluent society in a special speech on "Challenge for the Future" during the evening session.

Mr. MacDonald, who has been a teacher, journalist and lecturer, was CCF national organizer before being elected to the party provincial leadership in November, 1954. He had been national education director of the party.

Mr. MacDonald, campus CCF chief Gerry Caplan said last night initiated a shakeup of Ontario reform institutions several years ago and was this year the prime mover in the Ontario government's natural gas scandal which resulted in the resignation of several cabinet ministers.

Anyone can come to tomorrow's meetings, Caplan said, who does not belong to another campus party.

Caplan said, "We think the issues to be discussed at this convention, ranging from withdrawal of Canada from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization right down to the abolition of the death penalty are ones in which every thinking person on this campus should be interested."

Caplan, still hobbling on a cane after being in hospital with a torn knee ligament, said everyone at the convention will be allowed to speak and to vote on the resolutions.

The resolutions finally chosen will form the platform for upcoming Model Parliament elections.

"It is likely," Caplan said, "that foreign affairs will be discussed in the afternoon and the guest speaker will appear during the evening session."

Sessions will be held from 3:45-6 p.m. and from 7:15-10:30 p.m. in Trinity's Convocation Hall.

Economics Authority Attacks U.S., Britain

An authority on the economics of underdeveloped countries Sunday night said United States foreign policy shows "a lack of foresight and a disregard for national customs."

Prof. S. G. Triantis of the U of T's Political Science and Economics Department attacked the economic aid policies of Britain and the U.S. in a lecture on "nationalism in economic development" given to the International Students Organization.

Prof. Triantis is a specialist in the economics of underdeveloped countries, and a critic of Western economic aid policies.

Economic aid must be given slowly with a view to long-term results, he said.

"If you move suddenly from a temperature of 40 degrees to one of 80 degrees the change is uncomfortable; if you proceed slowly a better adjustment is achieved," he continued.

"Too often," he said, "spectacular industrial plans have been put into effect before the population of the country has enough to eat."

Prof. Triantis concluded his talk by citing instances when economic aid had been misused.

"The large British hydro-electric projects in India were built before use could be made of the electricity they produce," he said.

In just a little under four weeks from now, anywhere from 65 to 100 student delegates will gather in Winnipeg to attend the national conference of Canadian University Press.

They will begin by trying to define the purpose of the organization they represent — they may or may not succeed — they will form committees and workshops to talk over ways of making that organization better, they will go on from there to talk about students' rights — with particular emphasis on French Canada — they will revise their constitution and tabulate elaborate plans for next year, they will forget their differences in an idyllic flow of free beer and they will wind their carefree ways home again.

Toronto delegates may find themselves faced with considerably more opposition than might be expected. To begin with, in the eyes of many Canadians, Toronto has never been very popular.

As Canada's "City of the Big Shoulders," she has shoved herself into the industrial and commercial limelight of this country, and while hanging on to such epithets as "good," "cold" or "money-grubbing," has acquired a far from endearing personality in the eyes of her countrymen.

On the student level, the situation is much the same. Delegates from Nfcus, WUS, and CUP conferences report the same thing: Toronto University is big, big implies big-time, it leads to a mental block in many instances where understanding could have been the outcome.

At the Nfcus conference this Fall, Toronto faced a barrage of opposition from her moderate stand in a students' rights symposium; this year Maritime university students have banded together to present a united voting front against the powerful Ontario and Quebec universities.

In general, an overdose of confidence on the part of Toronto delegates and an innately suspicious provincialism on the part of smaller universities has led over the years to considerable doubt on this campus as to the worth of student conferences at all.

However, we happen to believe in them. When CUP meets for the last of this year's student sessions on a national level, its members will be facing the same problems that have faced university students all year: different needs and resulting different attitudes, too short a time to cope with them and the prospect of a long year with even longer distances to wipe much of their work away.

But at the risk of sounding trite, they are working towards national understanding much like that towards which their elder statesmen are supposedly working; they are trying to piece together the many parts of this anomaly that is Canada.

For the purpose alone, their conferences are worthwhile. And Toronto delegates, as representatives of the biggest and in many cases the most unpopular university, must above all be aware of their own position before trying to evaluate those of others.

Carabin: A Wonderful Time

... Gerard Filion hears a point

All's still well at 4 a.m. . . .

Throwing 80 strangers into a three-day circus and waiting for the reaction has more than mere curiosity as a purpose.

The purpose of the annual Carabin weekend an exchange between University of Montreal and U of T is fairly obvious. It is best summed up in that gentle word "understanding".

Funny thing about the Carabin weekend is that this purpose usually works. Last weekend some 80 strangers did begin to understand each other — and it took a judicious mixture of alcohol and hot air to do it.

Things rolled away Friday with that sort of strained gaiety which graces the worst fraternity parties and the best office get-togethers. The Montreal group ended lunch with a vociferous sing-song in the Great Hall of Hart House topped by a cabaret rendition of "C'est magnifique" by a voluptuous U of M gal on a table top.

Most of the Toronto students watched self-consciously, sobered by the dignity of their surroundings.

Discussions that afternoon were good. Outspoken Gerard Filion, editor of Le Devoir, provided a rich selection of topics individual groups could enlarge upon, and points raised were fired back at Filion later.

The strain began to disappear at an informal party in Burlington Friday night and 80 weary students struggled out of bed Saturday noon for a formal luncheon in the Royal York, sponsored by the City of Toronto and starring Mayor Phillips.

After afternoon discussions the Carabins headed north through blinding snow to the Nobelton town hall. Spagetti dinner, washed down with beer, was shaken by the hottest Dixie Land jazz group this side of Carolina.

Dancing broke up at midnight and the party adjourned to a fraternity. Rousing songs, cool dancing, friendly discussion and unlimited alcohol whistled away the hours till 6 a.m. mass.

Catching four hours sleep,

Carabins struggled to their feet for family dinners Sunday noon.

When the time came for a farewell tea, Toronto students were as carefree as their cousins and the "au revoir" at Union Station was so blaringly spectacular that assistant station masters were charging admission to the waiting room.

When the train finally pulled out, with the whole station echoing to Toronto and Montreal yells, everybody, in their own way, knew what it meant to "understand".

The Camera Eye Egypt

The Academic Orientalist

By Professor G. M. WICKENS
University College

What is Nasser really after? Is he sincere? Surely, the Arabs are in the right against the Jews? Are the Egyptians pro-West or do they favour Russia? Is American foreign policy to blame for the present situation? Had the Egyptians a right to the Canal? What is really happening? What do you think will happen now?

These, and many like them, are the questions to which you are exposed by being an authority on Islamic languages and cultures. However naturally they spring to the questioner's tongue, their crudity of phrasing and their naivety of conception can be demonstrated — and demonstration does in fact seem to be needed — merely by transposing the milieu. One does not commonly ask a Professor of French, un-academic though his approach to his subject may be, for an expert opinion on de Gaulle's chances of survival.

Partly, of course, it is the thinness on the ground of experts in matters Oriental that results in this popular tendency (particularly in North America) to force an academic authority on a region or a culture, or a language, into the several roles of political tipster, mind-reader, psycho-analyst, prophet and judge; and to the extent that the scholar allows himself to be degraded to the status of business-man's guide or state-department counsellor, so much does he lose of that independence of mind that alone allows him to pursue and present the essential truth as he sees it.

Sad, and often fantastic, experience would suggest that the modern educated man in the West knows less about Egypt — or, for that matter, about almost any other alien civilization — than did his forebears of a century ago. The very volume and variety of information now available — to say nothing of the technique of gross caricature essential to what is felt to be the imperative imparting of some mite of this information to the common man — these make it virtually impossible for the average intelligent layman to gain any realistic and trustworthy grasp on facts or ideas. Nor, given the barriers of language and lack of cultural sympathy or even interest, did the transportation of large numbers of Allied servicemen to the Near East during World War II do anything significant to alleviate such ignorance. I still wryly recall how the members of my own unit would sanction my interest in Egyptian speech, architecture, food or whatever, on the grounds that it both related to my peacetime profession and had also a wartime usefulness. But alas! for the oddball who should manifest such interest without my justifications. For the overwhelming majority of British fighting-men the Egyptians were "wogs", a term that would be qualified, as in the nature of things, by one or more of such assorted adjectives as "bloody, dirty, thieving, lying, crafty, crazy" and so on; they happened (as served them right) to occupy a god-forsaken area, where destiny had elected to confront the Allied and Axis powers. Mutatis mutandis one senses that much the same attitude prevails today among the civilian populations of the West. Indeed, primitive dislike is exacerbated by the fact that these alien beings have now begun to speak and act for themselves, incomprehensibly, it is true, but often (as in the case of the nationalization of the Canal) with world-shaking effect. Ignorance, which bred dislike, has now begotten fear also; for most Westerners, to judge by their remarks, it is all rather like a kaleidoscopic, nightmarish melodrama, in which grotesque night-shirted sambos cheer on flashy dagoes hellbent on dirty work at the crossroads of the world. It is almost asking too much, humanly speaking, to expect a sane attempt to understand that all this has a history, and even a coherent significance, of its own.

The academic Islamist will read items relating to Egypt in the world's newspapers: unlike the majority, he will read also as many Egyptian newspapers as he can lay hands on; he will talk to returned travellers and to visiting Egyptians; he will himself, if funds become available, visit Egypt as often as possible and talk there to all and any of whom he can obtain audience. But at the end of it all, he will not delude himself that he has, in the Guntherish sense, an "inside" knowledge of modern Egyptian affairs. Indeed, he will not normally aim to have something the validity of which he basically suspects. He does not care, fundamentally, what specific act Nasser or another performs today or tomorrow: that is the immediate practical concern of the diplomat, the soldier, or the business-man in whose intellectual formation he may, and certainly should, have had some part; and on the merit of his teaching must in the long run depend the soundness and the efficacy of their several reactions.

For him the interest of Egypt is in its degree of representativeness for the Islamic world as a whole at any point in the last 1300 years; in its cycles of subjection by foreigners, succeeded by their repeated absorption or expulsion; its abiding vigour, save during the 300 years or so of Turkish domination (early 16th to early 19th centuries), in literature, architecture and most of the arts; its ethnographic complexity; its linguistic case-history, with its far-reaching dichotomy between the written and the spoken word; above all, in the challenge some of its most active thinkers have been casting, for the past 100 years, at the inconsistencies and weaknesses (both real and apparent) of much that passes for Western thought and conduct. These challenges have often been emotional and theatrical, ill-balanced and only partially informed; but the West has known, and cared to know, nothing of them. Even now, after so many miscalculations and false appraisals, a hardy reporter's hot-tip on the personal corruptibility of otherwise of President Nasser is felt in the West to be of more interest and significance than, say, the political and social implications of attempts to introduce a Western concept of literacy into Egyptian public life. I can at least promise that my own students will hear more of the consequences of unveiling than they learn of the colour of the under pants worn by the "dancing Major".

It is now a generally accepted sociological fact that women in their infinite intuition wisdom come to the university to find a husband.

The not so widely accepted corollary to this fact is that men, although in their infinite naivete they may not realize it, come to the university to be found.

These thoughts are prompted by the announcement today of the engagement of two couples on The Varsity staff.

Coming in the midst of vast plans for university re-organization these engagements suggest that educators are not taking the marriage motive seriously enough in their attempt to draft out the aims of education.

Aims may come and aims may go but the marriage motive goes on forever.

And this is as it should be. We can think of no better place than the university to come to to choose a mate.

Of course educators are not to blame for failing to realize this. Most of them are men. And since man is a congenital bachelor the woman must keep him in the dark if education is to succeed in its aims.

The regrettable result, however, is that these males are incapable of organizing the university to accomplish these aims efficiently.

For instance scholarships are presently awarded on the basis of academic suitability rather than suitability as a marriage prospect.

The solution seems to be that the wives of university administrators must recognize their responsibility to influence subtly the course of university organization.

Only they can replace the naive idea of the university as an intellectual community with the recognition that the university is in fact a vast lonely hearts club. SA

gaudy by nature

Battling side by side with the University of Ottawa's troubles for prominence on the national student news page has been the tumultuous instability of Wycliffe College's governments.

The upheavals began when the government in power, the Anti-Clerical party, was overthrown by a vote of non-confidence. The opposition party, the Elizabethan Party Continued, formed a government but was overthrown by a similar vote.

When the third party, a coalition called the Neo-Thomist Catholic, Orthodox and Reformed party was thrown out, the Governor-General dissolved the session and called for a general election.

Friday the newly-formed Theocratic party swept to power over the favored Confederate party, and everybody hopes it will remain there long enough to give Wycliffe a breathing space.

The importance of student government in the college must not be underrated. The parliament is responsible for decisions on all student affairs, including financial matters.

Normally we do not presume to comment on internal college politics. However we cannot help noting that when a theological institution starts mixing church with state the result seems to produce an inspiring variety of names.

Gaudiness is next to Godliness.

I could not shout or scream,
He carried me into his room
Where we could not be seen;
He tore away my flimsy wrap
And gazed upon my form—
I was so cold and still and damp,
While he was wet and warm.
His feverish mouth he pressed to mine—
I let him have his way —
He drained me of my very self,
I could not say him nay.
He made me what I am. Alas!

Gone in an antipasto pastiche of noodles and spinach, finished long after his blue-white jag, dragging and flagging, wheezing while he squeezes out one last emasculate conception. Lawren is forlorn. Needs to be reborn. Harris is harrassed. Public is embarrassed. So who wins, eh? Tell me that you in your bloody Brooks brothers suit.

Now there is cause for alarm here, there and at Laing's this week. Because Lawren Harris when he was in seventh heaven with the Group of Seven painted some of the best postcards that ever went through the Canadian mails. True, he never knew much about Art, but then what Canadian does? Anyway who else thought of painting icebergs?

I was sipping sweet cider in the little old place with Lawren the other day and I said to him, "I like to watch a hanging but what you're hanging at Laing's kills me with pangs."

He sat there like an iceberg. "I mean," I went on, "an abstractionist has to depend on his talent and it just isn't your kind. These new things are out of a child's colouring book, incomprehensible colours and stop at the lines."

He began to melt, as I warmed up. "Lawren, Lawren, you were born to paint the picturesque, the Leonardo of the Christmas card. Go north, old man, go north."

The anti-Earle Grey Shakespeare Festival

Last summer, the Earle Grey Shakespeare Festival (now a foundation, God bless the mark!) opened their season with KING LEAR, which, judging by this performance at least, must rank with the finest of Shakespeare's comedies.

Two endmen self-consciously crept on stage and began to tell each other the day's events. At once the horrible thought assailed me: "Earle Grey is striving for realism; he's doing KING LEAR in the original Anglo-Saxon!" The truth is, I could not make out one word they were saying.

This interesting, but rather one-sided colloquy dragged on a few moments longer until interrupted by a rather scratchy fanfare, announcing the arrival of the principals. A motley crew, wearing the remnants of the preceding season's MACBETH costumes, sheepishly slunk into their positions.

Earle Grey as King Lear himself apparently was dominated by the stage directions in the fourth act: "Enter Lear, fantastically dressed", for he wore a fantastic wig that was only rivalled by his fantastic range of facial expressions, all of them extremely comical. One expected him at any moment to suddenly leap from his throne and chase some of the cute little pages about the stage. He didn't, however, worse luck!

Mary Godwin, whose voice is as annoying as her lack of talent, plays Goneril rather as a maiden aunt than as the eldest daughter. Fortunately, her powers of projection are limited and so one can quite comfortably sit back and listen to the gentle strains of the TSO wafting across the fields from Varsity Arena. All is not completely lost, except the two dollar admission price one has paid for the ticket.

Take Me To Your Leader

Shortly after the war, the celebrated French novelist, Verne, wrote an intriguing novel entitled, "You Shall Know Them", which asked the apparently simple question, "What is a man?"

In 1956, a horror film, The Invasion of The Body Snatchers, was released, which to all intents and purposes, asks the same question. In both the film and the book, the answer is equally difficult to determine.

The scene of the film (which, incidentally, is to be shown as part of a special double-bill horrothor for the Christmas season) is laid in a small, fairly isolated community. In this, it follows the pattern set by such horror classics as Frankenstein and The Thing, in which the humans are constrained to face up to their problems and find some solution on their own. Sometimes, in the lesser imitations of the classics, the problem is solved by a deus ex machina; the monster can't breathe oxygen, or falls in love with the heroine and commits a sort of monstrous hari-kari for her sake. This latter is the modern idea of the noble savage, so much more human than humans themselves.

Here, in Smalltown, USA, some of the local inhabitants begin exhibiting very odd symptoms.

With quick, masterful strokes, the various pieces of the jigsaw are fitted into place, and the full horror of these poor souls' position becomes clear: The bodies of the inhabitants are being taken over by some sort of alien intelligence, which we never see. These creatures leave huge pods lying about, which assume the shape of the human while he is asleep. It is never quite made clear what happens to the human's body once the progress of duplication has been completed, but this is a minor flaw in a movie that is characterised by a relentless logic.

How can one tell the alien from the human? Obviously, there is no way, as the two young lovers find out to their dismay.

Finally, these two are left alone in a village which is completely possessed by the creatures, with the knowledge that as soon as they fall asleep, even if it be for a few moments, they will be invaded by the monsters.

It is a tribute to the film makers that at this point they do not seek the easy way out of this predicament, but have continued to follow it out in a logical manner. And as such, it sets this film head and shoulders above any other of the current crop of ghoul films, such as The Zombies of Mora Tau, Macabre, and of course, I Married a Monster from Outer Space, which is nothing more than a rank imitation of this present film.

The ending of the film is as inconclusive as life itself. That's all, for now Holly, and I'll be seeing you soon.

For once, TIME magazine has met its match, in the brush reviewing style of Varsity film critic Ted Schafer. In this review, Schafer has even outdone himself in puns.

With Schafer, style is paramount, information secondary, if at all. But some consolation is in sight.

Eloquent bearded Schafer, at present seems to be concurrently engaged to all the female students of the University of Toronto. Keep up the good work, Schafer, from Holly and the boys.

BB In Bed

And God Created Woman, but He regrettably failed to provide a plot for this frivolous sexpedition, which reveals the much talked-about contours of Brigitte Bardot to Toronto eyeballs for the first time. It's almost more than they can bear.

In this somewhat sewerel picture, Miss Bardot is sensitively cast as a bitch, a pouty little fleshpot yearning for a man (Christian Marquand) who doesn't yearn back. This fact, however, doesn't seem to bother the bawdy wee body, for she weds his brother (Jean-Louis Trintignant) and beds down with an aging lecher (Curt Jurgens).

Throughout, Miss B's favorite costume is the wrap-around bath towel that does not quite wrap around. In fact, the movie makers spend so much time exposing the delectable piece of French pastry that they seem to overlook the exposition of the story, which is as patently contrived as one of Walter Mitty's daydreams.

The only point they appear to demonstrate is that while girls like Brigitte are quite hard to build, they are indeed very easy to make.

As for BB, she fills her part and her costume more than adequately and plays the girl who has been weighed in the balance and found wanton with transcendent vulgarity. She remembers almost all of her lines, undresses charmingly, and the language she speaks can be readily understood without subtitles.

For moviegoers who may not care for her personality, Brigitte herself offers in the film a word of consolation: "Don't worry," she says "I'll grow on you." If she does, it will be quite a depressing job to scrape her off.

Ted Schafer

the torch for the anti-Earle Grey Shakespeare Festival, with an amazing lack of success. His latest crush is Maria Callas.

whom we hope to hear of in the near future, preferably in some other country, is Helene Gilbert, who apparently considered Shakespeare's poetry of the same quality as those appalling scales singers belt out every now and then to keep their voice in trim. Each line was sung on a different time: it was a truly incredible performance. Tony Grey, in the rather unfortunate position of being son to both King Lear and Goneril, played Edgar as if his heart wasn't in it. At any rate, he played Edgar with a rare combination of unintelligibility and amateurishness.

Bright moments were contributed by the intermissions and the pauses between scenes. Interestingly enough, the line, "As flies to wanton boys are we to the gods; They kill us for their sport" was left out of this production. Nevertheless, it seemed to me that they strove to make up for the deficit by having Lear say to Cordelia: "Upon such sacrifices, my Cordelia, the gods themselves throw insects." Examination of the text, however, showed that the offending word was actually "incense".

But the high point of the evening's entertainment came when the bodies of both Lear and Cordelia had been carried offstage, the lights had been dimmed down, and the curtains were slowly being drawn across the inner stage. Just before they closed, we saw Cordelia, restored miraculously to life, crossing backstage to get in position for her final, totally undeserved curtain call.

In conclusion, I would like to give a little word of advice to the Earle Grey Shakespeare Festival Co., short of asking it to disband. That is, before presenting another production as interesting as this one, that you all get hold of a little film called A COMMUNICATIONS PRIMER, and memorize it as well as your lines in time for opening night. Thank you.

For Bissell Plan?

Ask Students' Opinions In Nation-wide Survey

U of T students will soon get another crack at voicing their opinions on the Bissell committee report on student aid.

A cross-section of the campus will be provided with copies of the report and asked to give detailed opinion on it.

Results of the poll will be submitted to the National Federation of Canadian University Students as part of a nation-wide survey of student opinion on the Advisory Committee plan.

If national opinion is generally favorable to the recommendations, Nfucs plans to throw its weight behind the aid plan "in order to publicize and attract the attention of public opinion and Parliament".

A special Students' Administrative Council committee was formed last week at the request of Nfucs executive secretary Andre L'Heureux to study the plan and make recommendations on it to the SAC.

The scope of the study was suddenly enlarged when U of T vice-president Murray Ross placed an unlimited number of report copies at the committee's disposal.

Now the committee's three members, SAC president Vince Kelly, Bob Lee and Doug Branton, National Affairs chairman and vice-chairman, plan to distribute the copies to obtain a cross-section of student opinion.

Poll results will be included in a committee report which will be forwarded to Nfucs after approval by the SAC.

Since students will be able to read the entire Advisory Committee report, replies to the poll are expected to be more complete than those previously gathered, Kelly said Sunday.

The committee will decide tonight how many and what students will be included in the survey. They will also decide on a proposal by Branton to include fifth-form students and teachers in the poll.

All the committee's members have reservations about the plan, although they subscribe to it in principle.

The Advisory Committee recommendation to revise the length of summer vacations is "a really good idea", but it should not be applied until more assistance is available for all students, Lee said last night.

Students "should pay something" for their education, he said. "Sufficient money should be given to first-class students, and the rest distributed among second and third class students", he said.

Main value of the new plan is that it takes action on what people have been "vaguely talking about" for years. "It will lead eventually to what we're looking for, which is equality of education", he said.

Branton also criticized the revised summer vacation scheme. "I'm not particularly in favor of it, but it is not stressed in the report", he said.

"I think the principle of providing education to those who deserve it is excellent—and I'm a third-class student", he said.

Kelly said he had some criticisms of the proposed revisions, but "the plan is sufficiently flexible" to allow for changes.

The selection of students for the poll will be "as large as possible", but will not be "an unwieldy number", Kelly said.

THROUGH THE PERILOUS NIGHT

That Was The Tune To The U of M Doom

By GENE GLISKY
Associated Sports Editor

To the dying refrains of The Star Spangled Banner, Varsity Blues roared into action, and they scored and scored and scored.

Stated simply, Blues hammered University of Michigan Wolverines 7-2 in exhibition hockey last night.

The first period saw fast and furious action, with the accent on fury. Wolverines, big, rough and ready, proceeded to play the wallop-and-tumble hockey Blues themselves are so adept at.

Grant Mills opened the scoring for Varsity at the five-minute mark. On a three-way power play with Brian Anderson and Mike Elik, Mills popped the rubber in from in front of the Michigan net.

Howie (Li'l B'ar) Roth, with sterling assists from Dunc Brodie and Bill (Bear) Kennedy, walloped the Blues' second marker at 11:53 of the period.

That ended the scoring for the frame, the boys getting down to the more serious business of smearing each other into the ice.

Exciting — you bet! 3,000 roaring fans screamed for action and got blood. Seven penalties were handed out, with six in the last ten minutes.

A much-subdued crew of ice-gamers waltzed out for the second period. Perhaps the jovial, and rather touching, tribute paid Red Stephen in the interim did much to allay the savage breast.

Whatever the cause, the "let's be buddies" attitude caught Blues unprepared. Wolverine's Barrie Hayton beat Varsity's goalie Ray Dunn with a screen shot at 1:29 of the period. John Hutton and Bobbie Watt assisted.

Red Stephen Says Thank-you

By JOHN BROOKS
Varsity Sports Editor

A 28-year old Varsity hockey player stood near centre ice in Varsity Arena last night, grinned at 3,000 ardent fans, and said: "Thank you very much."

His name was Dave "Red" Stephen, and he had just become the first Varsity athlete ever honored with his own "night." On the table in front of him were three objects he will treasure.

University athletic director Warren Stevens had presented Red with a suitably-engraved replica of the Queen's Cup. The team had presented him with a doctor's bag, and the Faculty of Medicine with a sterling silver ginger ale mug.

Colorful even when "on the spot," with a microphone in hand and 6,000 ears listening, Red made a few cracks about his gifts and told a typically-amusing tale:

"A lot of people think I arranged this all by myself. I didn't really; I had lots of help." The crowd roared, and Red laughed along with them.

Jovial, and yet at the same time obviously overwhelmed by the tribute, Red was sincere in his thanks to the various people who had made the event possible.

And it was fitting that he saved his acknowledgement of the team's part until the last. It indicated how very much he appreciated his opportunity to play in a Varsity uniform.

And the applause of the fans when he finished was positive proof that it was a mutual feeling.

But there was a telegram, sent to Red, with the following message: "Congratulations, Red, on your eighth year. Hope you enjoy your next four in law school."

We wonder . . .

the very tired Wolverine defensive corps.

Defensively, Blues were unbeatable. Stacey, as well as combining with Red Stephen on attack, time and time again acted as a second goalkeeper.

The Goldust Twins, Harry Neale and Ron Casey, are perhaps the smoothest defence unit hockey enthusiasts have seen in a long time. Uncanny on passing, they are always dangerous on the attack.

Always cool, calm and collected, goalie Ray Dunn, although never hard-pressed, was ever on the spot when needed.

Lacking bench strength, the U of M crew played better hockey than the score might indicate; they were, however, a very tired team at the end of the game.

Don Lipke Returning Receives OK To Play

Coach Elated Over News

By MIKE CHYKALIUK
Varsity Staff Reporter

Good news lightened the worries of Varsity basketball coach John McManus yesterday. Doctors advised last year's leading scorer Don Lipke that he would be able to play again this year.

At the start of the season it was feared that he would be unable to participate because of a collapsed lung.

This added scoring punch should definitely make Blues a threat to retain their senior basketball title.

The fine performance of Ruby Richman and Peter Potter, plus the notable improvement of John Dacshyn, Bill Patterson, Bob Ecclestone, and Jimmy Maguire are two other reasons for jubilation.

With a few more games under their belts, these players should jell into a smooth-working unit.

Tonight, Blues continue their exhibition tour by journeying to Parkdale to meet Andy's Athletic Club. Varsity previously defeated them 71-63.

Bill Kennedy Leader In Intercol Scoring

The Varsity hockey Blues started their season off this past weekend in a scoring way. Blues occupy the first six places in the scoring race, while a total of thirteen Varsity players made their entrance on the scoring sheet.

Center Bill Kennedy, playing his first season in the Intercollegiate, leads the league. He has lit the lamp on three occasions, while assisting on five other efforts for a total of eight points.

Linemate Dunc Brodie occupies the second position with a goal and four assists.

Tied for third spot are Varsity forwards Howie Roth and John MacDonald who each scored three times and garnered one assist, and perennial star defenseman Dave Stephen who this weekend collected a goal and three assists.

Laval's all-star line of Michel Lagace, Pierre Raymond, and Andre Arseneault are once more in the thick of the scoring race. They have a total of four goals and four assists.

McGill's only player to gather more than a point this weekend was Ivan Saunders. He managed to score two goals.

The only other goal-scorer for the Redmen so far was Joe Poirier, who is better known for his scoring feats on the gridiron.

The Blues have once more taken a commanding lead in another department. For the third straight year, Varsity leads the penalty parade.

As a team, the Blues have served a total of 65 minutes. McGill lags far behind with only 14 minutes while Laval players have only received five minors.

Marriage Strikes Varsity Five Staffers To Wed

Varsity staffs are notoriously the most unstable of aggregations. In the past, personal conflicts, professional, ethical and ideological differences have sent many a good staff into non-existence.

Now a new factor threatens the stability, the machine-like efficiency of The Varsity news-gathering mechanism.

The threat is matrimony.

Yesterday, like a bombshell, news that five Varsity staffers, and an ex-AM&D editor will marry, among themselves, shattered the calm of our offices.

First to publish officially their bans were Varsity features editor Elizabeth Binks and John Gray, Canadian University Press editor.

The two 21-year-olds, natives of Toronto and veterans of three years of Varsity service each, say they will marry in 1960 and travel to England soon after the wedding.

Miss Binks is in her fourth year of English Language and Literature at Trinity College. Mr. Gray, completing his third year of the General Course at University College, was last year's news editor and plans a career in journalism.

Also to wed are Sam Ajzenstat, Varsity editor - without portfolio, and Janet MacDonald, last year's AM&D editor.

The pair, in their third and fourth year respectively of honor arts courses, hope to marry this Christmas. Though indefinite, their honeymoon may take the form of a trip to Pittsburgh, Pa., to view a special art show.

Mr. Ajzenstat, a veteran of three years service on the paper, was last year's features editor.

A third marriage planned includes co-AM&D editor Warren Wilson, long a Varsity staffer.

Mr. Wilson announced last night he will marry, probably in March, Holly Rattigan, a part-time Varsity reporter and extension department student of Russian.

Mr. Wilson, whose engagement was least expected by the staff, said last night he met the vivacious, 20-year-old Miss Rattigan, while covering a story on U of T's extension department Russian course.

$50 and Wallet Stolen

A University of Toronto law student said today Toronto police are investigating the theft of his wallet containing $50 from Hart House.

First-year law student Milt Zysman said he lost the money about two weeks ago when his wallet was removed from his coat while he was reading in the Hart House library.

He said the theft was reported to the University police at the time, but it was not until yesterday he was advised to put the matter in the hands of city police.

Campus Progressive Conservatives will meet this Friday afternoon to formulate a platform for the upcoming Model Parliament elections.

Suggestions for revising the Bill of Rights and discussion of the report of Pres. Bissell's advisory planning committee are expected to head the list of resolutions submitted to party members for approval.

Other possible planks for the platform are Northern Development, the Columbia River development schemes, a revamping of the divorce laws and Senate Reform.

The Conservative club will form a special committee to handle matter connected with the Model Parliament, the club's MP leader Jeremy Johnston (IV Trin) said last night.

"We hope the committee, to be formed of both executive and rank and file members will lighten the work load of our regular executive", Johnston said.

A SMILING President Claude Bissell gave $5 for Share Tuesday to Sue Evans, World University Service chairman. The gift represented almost one-tenth of Share's earnings to date. The President said he "heartily endorses" the projects to provide aid for students in Israel, Egypt, Vietnam, India and Japan. "Through this program, which helps others to help themselves, we are demonstrating our awareness of their problems and our genuine desire to ameliorate conditions among the students of these countries," he said. CCF Convene, Talk, Elect Peacock Leader Events moved fast at a CCF club convention in Trinity's Convocation Hall yesterday.

During the convention members passed resolutions for the forthcoming Model Parliament, heard a keynote address by Ontario CCF leader Donald MacDonald and chose their parliamentary leader.

Hugh Peacock (II UC) was elected to lead the party during the Model Parliament. Others nominated for the post were Gerry Caplan (III UC), Jack Parnes (III UC), Harvey Levenstein (III UC) and Boggen Kipling (III UC).

Peacock announced one of the main issues of the campaign will be the emergence of the new political alignment.

"We will be forcing the Liberal party more and more to split between CCF and Progressive Conservative, or all the way," he said.

Mr. MacDonald, outlining the challenge facing democratic Socialists, said "wealth is an almost embarrassing surplus. In spite of the abundance of luxuries in Canada, there is an urgent need for such things as schools, hospitals, parks, new roads and health and welfare services."

Governments are the only hope for eliminating this contradiction, he said.

The Bissell plan is a step in the right direction, he said, but "it illustrates the penny pinching approach we are making to education."

Resolutions were passed during the convention on nuclear tests, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, social and economic planning, free university education, Canadian culture, capital punishment, narcotics, and humane slaughtering legislation.

MONTREAL — CUP — The Quebec Association of Universities is plitting apart at the seams, sources here say.

Following fast on the Association's meeting Tuesday with Quebec Premier Maurice Duplessis the Bishop's University students' council voted yesterday to leave the Association.

Sherbrooke University is also expected to pull out of the Association, the sources say.

Meanwhile the University of Montreal and Quebec's Laval University are deepening the rift by pushing for stronger action against the Quebec Premier.

The press release handed out by the Association after the Tuesday meeting with Duplessis was "tempered" by pro-Duplessis demands by Bishop's and Sherbrooke.

In the release students said although they were not allowed to present all of the brief they had prepared, the Premier seemed interested in their request that bursaries be made outright grants and a system of emergency financing be set up.

But U of M student president Jean Cournoyer said he was "personally not satisfied" with the interview.

Explaining their surprise action yesterday, the Bishop's student council said "we do not believe that federal grants are within the jurisdiction of students, nor do we believe in education becoming a political issue."

Bishop's has always been considered the most conservative member of the Association, the sources say. Many of the group's actions have been tailored to suit the demands of Bishop's student president Ray Jensen.

Quebec university newspapers have always stressed editorially that unity among the Association's six members was its strongest factor.

The Association's two-hour meeting with Premier Duplessis Tuesday was almost a year in the making.

On Duplessis' insistence, the talk dealt exclusively with matters he considered to be the students' concern, and centered around legislation his government is considering for provincial assistance to needy students.

Meeting behind closed doors, the Premier refused to make a personal statement, but issued a brief press release through a spokesman.

The release said in part:

"The universities' delegates came out of the premier's office at about 10 minutes past noon."

"We studied suggestions dealing with the proposed legislation. All took place in a cordial atmosphere."

The six university student presidents told reporters Duplessis had limited discussion strictly to proposed bursary legislation.

The students felt that although this is a step in the right direction, something must be done to help the universities as well or increased tuition fees may defeat the bursaries' purpose.

In a brief prepared especially for the legislative assembly now in session, students made the following six recommendations:

—there should be no financial obstacles to primary and secondary education.

—the number of Aid-to-Youth bursaries should be increased.

—the amount of these bursaries should be augmented to include both tuition fees and living expenses when necessary.

—the clause stipulating that a part of these bursaries be remitted to the government by the beneficiaries should be abolished.

—the principle of annual "per capita" grants to universities with fixed payment dates should be recognised in the form of legal statutes which should provide a method of distribution as well as a method of making periodic adjustments.

Forced into a limited discussion, the students could not present the brief in toto. They attempted to read from it but were brought to order whenever they ventured into territory the premier considered beyond their competence.

The student leaders, who will report back to their councils, said they could not gauge the success of the talks until the proposed legislation is brought before the Legislature.

May Reconcile Crowe Dispute

BRANDON, — CUP — United College tallied up a fifth official resignation this week over the controversial Harry Crowe case.

But unconfirmed sources here indicate reconciliation between college administration and the ousted Professor Crow may be shaping up.

Rev. S. H. Searle who submitted his resignation Monday from the College Synod, said Tuesday he had been informed by telephone that settlement was underway and his letter was being returned.

He refused to say who called him but said if reconciliation was reached he would not resign.

Rev. Searle, Brandon member of the college Synod and pastor of Knox United Church there, said Monday his resignation was "a last resort decision" when conciliatory measures failed between himself and the administration.

"The unyielding attitude of the principal and board of regents of the college in the professor affair has left no other course open to me," he said.

An executive member of the Manitoba Conference of the United Church, Dr. Clifford Matchett of Minnedosa, said Tuesday reconciliation was in the making and statements could be expected shortly from both the College and Prof. Crowe.

Prof. Crowe was dismissed from office early this fall when a letter he wrote to a colleague criticizing the college reached the attention of Principal W. C. Lockhart.

Last week four professors resigned because of the administration's adamant stand on the matter.

College authorities had failed to react to a recommendation of "unjust" made by an investigation committee of the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

Slow 'Nensis

Advance sales of Torontonensis passed the 850 mark yesterday as the yearbook's sales campaign moved into its final two days.

Sales are generally slow for the special $4 bargain offer, with a low at University College and a high at Victoria, 'Nensis editor Sandra Whittall said last night.

"There is still a waiting list of 200 for last year's 'Nensis, yet people just aren't buying," she said.

After Friday, price of the yearbook goes up to the standard $4.50 price.

Share in despair Failure in the air

The Share campaign stumbled into its last two days of canvassing yesterday with less than one percent of its objective in the Share safe.

Grand total for earnings to date stood at $78.25 last night, with $10 of that amount coming from private donations.

Five colleges and faculties out of a total 21 campaigning declared returns as of last night. A fleet of 80 canvassers at St. Mike's shot the college to the head of the score board with $35 in returns. Trinity College stood in second place with $22.

Returns were so negligible that the Share thermometer outside the Students' Administrative Council office remained at zero yesterday at the end of the third day of campaigning.

Objective for the campaign is $13,000, or $1 per student for World University Service projects in underdeveloped countries.

WUS chairman Sue Evans pleaded for "more effort" last night from canvassers. "I'm really shocked — I thought it would be much better than that," she said.

Miss Evans threatened External Affairs representatives with "pain of death" if they did not declare returns in the SAC office.

"No procrastination, please — people are going to give eventually, so why can't they give now," she said.

"We've spent the last month putting all the wheels of Share into motion, but the chain is breaking down," she said.

The campaign's two big donors, Trinity and St. Mike's, both plan Share functions tomorrow.

Trinity's traditional auction will be held in The Buttery at 1 p.m., tomorrow. Girls will be among the "miscellaneous objects" up for sale, officials say.

SMC girls will model Vera Worth fashions for Share at 8.30 p.m. in Brennan Hall.

Plan Takes Blast In Carpenter Talk

Dr. E. S. Carpenter scalded the Russell Plan last night for denying society of its essential strength—"the oddball."

He criticized the screening methods in the plan resulting in exclusion of students of low academic standards who maintain a cohesive force in the university.

"It isn't the man who can come up with the answers who will offer the new ideas, it's the man who can ask the questions," he said in an open discussion to the Osler Medical Society.

Condemning newspapers in modern society for the main part of his address, he said "the newspaperman is cynical about everything except himself and his work."

He termed newspapers as a hundred-ring circus let loose on the city every day, in which The Globe and Mail is worse than the Star. "They all lie," he said. "At least with the Star, the fangs show."

Newspapers are an art form, he said, and by their design "they cannot describe a serious subject. They want sensationalism, and above all, they want conflict."

"The only ones who take newspapers seriously," he continued, "are bureaucrats, particularly civil servants." He described the ability of a newspaper to prod a civil servant into action, as "the last constructive function of newspapers."

Blasting TIME and Newsweek, he described TIME as "a wonderful tranquilizer" and said it not only reports facts, but also tells you how to respond to those facts.

"There are no values in Time magazine. They muffed it once—they began to support Eisenhower. Newsweek has the same biases, but it's not so nicely packaged."

"Freedom of the press is a lot of bunk. The press is free only in the sense that it is free from all moral restraint," he charged.

He said the press is completely controlled by its advertisers, and warned that advertising will disappear in our own lifetime.

Other targets of Dr. Carpenter's attack:

Eisenhower — "If you've ever seen the man in a press conference, you'll know he's utterly inarticulate. . . He's about as qualified as Yogi Berra for his position (as president)."

Sidney Smith — "He distrusted everything he couldn't understand."

He surrounded himself by (a staff of) smiling public-relation types."

U of T — "This university prides itself on its ability to get along without scholars. . . With very few exceptions it has never produced scholars and never tolerated them."

Society Must Take Blame For Drug Addict Problem

Society took the blame yesterday for the unsuccessful rehabilitation of drug addicts when the chief psychologist for the Ontario Department of Reform Institutions addressed a meeting of the United Nations Club.

Dr. T. H. Potts described the addict as "the least understood of all convicts" and said society's "fearful and distrustful attitude" is preventing solution to the problem.

Opposing popular belief, the psychologist denied that crimes are caused by drug addiction.

"Addiction inhibits physical activities and tends to deter any violent crimes," he said. "Seventy-five percent of drug addicts have previous crime records."

Pessimistic about the future of narcotics, Dr. Potts said, "It will be with us a long time," and added, "No economic class is free from addiction."

"There are over 3,000 addicts of both sexes in Canada and 700 in Ontario," he said. "Few young addicts are found as yet but the age limit is gradually diminishing."

Addicts over 45 years are not receptive to psychotherapy, group and occupational therapy offered as clinical treatment.

more things are wrought

When old orders change and give place to new ones, there is usually not very much feeling of peace, friendship and goodwill floating around.

On the contrary, the atmosphere is usually loaded with enmity, ill feeling and bad grace.

Old orders are changing fast these days. Throughout the world authority and the "status quo" are being challenged on grounds which our great grandfathers would have called insolent, radical or treacherous.

One doesn't have to go as far afield as Cyprus for an example. Instances of much the same reaction are visible in the University of Ottawa, in United College in Winnipeg and in the University College residence.

These three cases, the cases of Ed Lacey and Harry Crowe and the case of the three editors of La Rotonde, all have something besides the background of a university in common.

Each represents a reaction against an authority which has asserted its rights. If this were all, then the three "victims" would have small cause to complain. The doctrine of Authority, although often abused, is as valid now as it ever was.

Unfortunately, that is not all. In each instance, the Authority seems to have asserted questionable rights in a questionable way.

Authority, in other words, may have made a mistake.

This would be fine if it were possible for Authority to concede it may have made a mistake. But in spite of our machine-tooled democracy and our faith in the rights of the individual, it is not possible, it seems, for Authority to concede anything of the sort.

Authority must still preserve face.

The theory that the King can do no wrong, that the Colonial District Commissioner can never be compromised in front of the natives, that the high school principal has absolute control, is each in its own way valid for pragmatic reasons as much as any other.

But since the end of the Second World War Petitions of Rights have been frequent, District Commissioners have been recalled and high school principals have given up in despair.

We cannot entirely abandon the concept of Authority or society will degenerate into chaos. Authority still remains valid when it commands a higher knowledge of the general good.

But when this higher knowledge is claimed by university officials over their colleagues or students in the same intellectual community, and when they assert this claim when they are dealing with non-academic matters, they are bound to be challenged.

The university officials in such a position have two avenues open to them. They may hold fast to their doctrines of Authority by sticking to their guns or they may abandon the concept in favor of a more flexible attitude and risk losing face.

The traditional concept of Authority seems outdated in any university. It becomes incompatible in an enlightened university.

Sometimes the human humility involved in losing face is more to the general good than the enmity and bitterness which is the normal alternative.

Canadian - US Economy

Mutual Trade Pacts

By HOWIE RUBINOFF

Second of a series on the second McGill Conference on World Affairs.

Economic conflict is certainly the biggest thorn in the side of better Canadian-American relations. Canada's annual trade deficit with the United States is over a billion dollars a year. A very significant part of Canadian industry is controlled by US capital. The US sells government subsidized wheat at below world prices, or accepts soft currency for her wheat from countries which are normally a market for Canadian wheat, resulting in ever increasing wheat surpluses in Canadian grain elevators. Most of the St. Lawrence Seaway is in Canada and the bulk of the cost is being borne by the Canadian Government, yet US authorities are demanding an equal voice in administration and an equal share of the tolls. The US wants to develop the lower Columbia River for her power-hungry Pacific North West. Canada wants to hold the Columbia in reserve to develop power for future needs arising in British Columbia. These are but some of the economic issues which constantly tug at the bond of friendship between Canada and the American giant.

American imports from Canada are almost entirely all raw materials, whereas Canada's imports from the US are almost all manufactured goods. A prohibitive US tariff prevents Canadian manufactured goods or raw materials which are also produced in the US from competing on the American market. Zinc and lead mines in the US are operating at a considerable loss, yet because the mine owners maintain a lobby in Washington a high US tariff is imposed on zinc and lead and subsidies are paid to these mines to keep them in operation. This is only a small annoyance for Canada since zinc and lead represent only a small fraction of our total national product, but for countries like Chile or Peru which depend very heavily on these metals the high US tariff threatens the very basis of their economic structure. Similar examples are the US restrictions on tin from Bolivia and Malaya or oil from Venezuela. In response to criticism the US government says that trade is carried out by private capital in the US and therefore the government can't start interfering (Re: Eisenhower's July 7 speech at Ottawa), however the US can no longer play the part of the hard-boiled Yankee Trader in foreign trade and still expect to maintain good relations with other countries at the political level.

American investment has opened vast new areas in Canada, provides many people with employment and adds handsome sums to Canadian tax coffers. Why then all the outcry against American investment capital? Our biggest fear is that with such widespread American control of Canada's economy the US will be in such a strong bargaining position that should they desire they could force our hand at will. So far this fear has proved to be far more theoretical than real.

It has been charged that American owned companies won't allow Canadians to purchase shares in these companies, but when such shares have been put on the market Canadians have been unwilling to put up the necessary risk capital.

Rather than investing in their own country Canadians prefer to invest in Brazilian Traction and Power or Jamaican bauxite.

American owned companies seldom employ Canadians in top positions and this has certainly been a cause of irritation although many of these companies are now changing their policy in this regard. In this same vein Canadian engineers have been laid off during the recession and replaced by American engineers while conditions were slack in the US.

Among the suggestions made for ways of exercising control over American investment the most strenuous ones often came from the American delegates themselves. They appreciated Canadian fears and suggested our government pass laws making it mandatory that a certain percentage of the shares in any company be owned by Canadians, that Canadians be employed wherever possible, and that the government should have certain restrictive legislation in reserve to be used in time of emergency. It was suggested that if private Canadian capital was unwilling to invest in Canadian industries the government should step in and buy the shares since they above anybody should be willing to invest in Canada. This suggestion however immediately raised cries of Socialism and it was hurriedly dropped.

Labour unions in Canada have always depended on their US brethren for support and leadership and in some instances appear to be mere puppets of their American counterparts. With the apparent entry of Canadian labour into politics it is not inconceivable that American labour could have a considerable influence on Canadian politics. Canadian delegates shuddered at the thought of racket boss Jimmy Hoffa calling the tune in a future Canadian election.

On Canada's side of the tariff wall we have imposed small but nevertheless annoying tariffs in reprisal against the US. Last year it was a special tax on advertising in all Canadian editions of American owned magazines, which has forced all but a few of the real big boys (Life, Reader's Digest) to discontinue their Canadian editions. The excuse given for this special tax was the need to encourage the development of Canadian owned and operated magazines. If Canadian magazines are worth reading they should be able to survive on their own merits without the benefit of such restrictive and unfair laws.

In conclusion the conference decided that the US must realign her trade policy to make conditions more favourable for those nations on whom she is politically dependent. Foreign trade is too closely bound to foreign relations to allow it to be controlled by the vagaries of US big business. In regard to Canada and the US itself the delegates decided that class co-operation and consultation should be carried out by the governments of both countries on all matters of trade which are likely to affect each other. In this way many childish and annoying incidents could be avoided and a sounder trade policy would be worked out to the mutual benefit of both countries.

CO-ED REVISITED

She walks in vacuo, like the blight,
Reading tealeaves, just for spite.
To all statements, wide-eyed, she Answers with a heartfelt "Gee!"
Her pony-tail she proudly vaunts,
And wretched bus-drivers with it taunts;
"Tis but another feminine wile,"
She says, bestowing a lascivious smile.
She craves excitement, so she does vouch,
But is, with men, a saint-nitouche.
But still we love her and her faults,
And hope to trap her in the vaults —
For in seduction there's such romance
Can remedy even her blindest glance!

ROSALYN TUREK

For the first time in ten years Toronto music lovers will be able to hear pianist Rosalyn Turek whose recent concert in Edinburgh provided "the most highly concentrated experience of a lifetime spent in music" for one distinguished critic.

The Women's Musical Club of Toronto is presenting the foremost female interpreter of Bach this afternoon in Eaton Auditorium at 2:00 p.m.

Miss Turek is the first woman in history to be invited to conduct the New York Philharmonic; she will appear as York Philharmonic; she will appear as mid-December.

Miss Turek will be heard in an all-Bach programme. Considering Miss Turek's words "The Music of Bach is so universal in its meaning and so all-embracing in its musical structures that for the receptive mind it illuminates all other music, including contemporary music," her interpretation of Bach should be most interesting and definitive.

Highlights of the programme are: the Capriccio for a Departing Brother, the Partita No. 6 and the Italian Concerto. Student tickets are a give-away at 50 cents.

LIVELY LISA

Eaton Auditorium was almost filled to capacity Monday night for the leading soprano of the Vienna State Opera, Lisa Della Casa. The reception for this consummate actress was rather cool at first, probably due to her programme, large chunks of Schubert, Brahms and Strauss lieder, interspersed with the occasional aria.

Those who expected a more operatic programme from this excellent singing actress, were somewhat disappointed and justly so, since Miss Della Casa is the world's leading Mozart soprano.

In appearance, no singer could present a more striking picture, a vivacious personality, the facial agility of a Bernhardt, the beauty and voice of an angel.

Her pianissimo has made her famous and for Mozart-singing this is indispensable. Unfortunately we only heard one aria by Mozart, 'Dove sono' from Le Nozze di Figaro. But her rare, overpowering art made this aria the highlight of the concert. How well the oboe-like timbre of her higher register is suited to the surging and flowing melodic line of this aria.

Three songs by Schubert opened the programme. An der Mond, Du bist die Ruh' and Gretchen am Spinnrade. German experts thought some of her enunciation improper, but the feeling and expression she put into every syllable made the reservation insignificant.

The Brahms selection which followed gave accompanist Arpad Sandor an excellent opportunity for expression, for the piano part of these songs are much more than an oom-pah accompaniment. The delicate phrasing in the first number, Feldeinsamkeit, matched the effortless production of Miss Della Casa. The second number, Der Jäger, was a short, brisk song about a much-hunted huntsman. The overpowering stage presence and theatrics of the singer during this number drew little applause; possibly the audience was aghast at this levity amid sacrosanct Brahms' lieder.

At intermission the audience was pined with a non-descript punch which made a friend of mine bemoan the lack of potted plants on Eaton's Seventh Floor.

The last group of lieder was by Richard Strauss. Here again Miss Della Casa displayed total command of the notional and musical situation.

The only regrettable facet of the concert were the songs that Miss Della Casa undertook in English. One could understand only enough of the words to know that she was singing in English—little else.

'Un bel ciel' from Puccini's Madame Butterfly was the only musical flop of the evening. After a very embarrassing first note Miss Della Casa started to speed up, almost losing her accompanist, ignored all of the emotional subtleties and finished the aria in record time. The audience had very little trouble in extracting many beautiful encores from the artist.

Elmo Ciprietti

marion ross

Marion Ross, pianist, appeared yesterday in the third of a series of Wednesday five o'clock recitals presented by the Hart House Music Committee. A graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Music, Miss Ross chose a program of Mozart, Chopin, Prokofiev and Scriabine.

The Sonata in A minor, K. 310 opened the program. Here is Mozart at his most dramatic. The tense, almost martial Allegro maestoso, the agitation in the middle of the Andante offsetting the consoling lyricism of its opening, the remarkable finale with its enigmatical perpetual motion, combine to make this a most personal expression of nearly unrelieved darkness. Unfortunately, Miss Ross did not convey this. Hampered by nervousness and a too brilliant instrument, she tended to push the tempo in the first and last movements, and muffle florid passages in an attempt to achieve a consistent piano.

The mazurka, Op. 33, No. 2 opened the Chopin group. Here again more articulation was needed, particularly with the ornaments, though her rendering had the necessary verve. Miss Ross was more at home with the D flat prelude, the so-called "Raindrop" displaying a lovely singing line. The G minor ballade, however, though containing many good points of style, lacked over-all effect and technical stability.

Miss Ross' best playing was that of the Third Prokofiev sonata, in one movement. A convincingly rhythmic and percussive opening led to a contrasting lyric episode which Miss Ross handled capably. Throughout a good sense of continuity and characteristically brittle humor was projected.

Miss Ross ended her program with two études by Scriabine from Opus 8 and the Delibes' Nocturne.

Lavender and Old Lace on TV

When the Metropolitan Opera Company presented Tchaikovsky's lyrical opera, Eugene Onegin at Maple Leaf Gardens last May, Toronto musical critics, passed it off as a delicate piece of lavender and old lace, charming fro-frou, and every other piece of damning faint praise they could think of to disguise the fact that their appreciation of opera has barely progressed beyond the frontiers of Italian schmalz. But then, they like Callas, too, so this should come as no surprise to those of us who have some musical taste.

In the face of one of the most lavish Canadian television productions of opera ever presented in the history of the CBC, these same critics have remained notoriously silent, with the glaring exception of the self-styled god of the Radio-TV column, Gordon Sinclair, who blasted the show before it had even been aired. It was a new low in criticism of any kind.

Those who were fortunate enough to watch the CBC production last night were treated to a quietly lovely musical experience, a most refreshing change from the Verdian bombast or Wagnerian boredom. That the opera did not completely come across was more a fault of the television medium itself than of the performance; and I can say this with complete sincerity, since I (and Holly, of course) was able to see the production both in the studio itself during dress rehearsal and that night on TV.

When the CBC-TV studios were being built, those who had approved the designs displayed an admirable lack of foresight in the amount of space apportioned to the main studio. Studio 1. Studio 1 is cramped enough for space as it is with two complete sets; it is unbelievably suffocated when it contains four major sets, three of which are used for massive ballroom scenes, and for some Russian folk dances, which unfortunately do not come up to the standard of the Moseyev Dance Company, even with Met choreographer Zachary So-lov's flair for this type of dance.

At least one of the sets, the ballroom scene, for which Tchaikovsky has composed one of his most brilliant waltzes, must be put up in place of a huge outdoor scene in the incredible time of five minutes! To accomplish this feat, the stage hands had to be rehearsed almost as thoroughly as the singers themselves.

The orchestra had to be placed in a separate studio, from which the benign features of conductor Walter Susskind were beamed into the dozen or so monitors hung about the main studio at every conceivable angle. Assistant conductor Mario Bernardi was on hand in case the singers lost sight of the monitors; he came into his own during choral bits, when masses of people had to depend on him alone to keep in time. Set designer Nicolai Soloviov, who had worked with Eisenstein on Alexander Nevsky and Ivan The Terrible, strolled through the studio, taking pictures of his masterpiece.

It was all very impressive. Hearing the orchestra and singers close up, listening to Ustinov's mellifluous tones, one could be very easily swept away by everything about the production. I was quite willing to concede that this was the best opera production the CBC has ever done.

But what a disappointment that night, seeing the finished product on TV! All the inadequacies of Herman Geiger-Torel's staging were made manifest, combined with a singular inability on the part of the director (Franz Kraemer) to seek out beautiful and significant visuals on the TV screen.

And the singers and the orchestra who had so excited us that afternoon, hardly seemed the same. The medium seemed to extract all the brilliance of the singers' voices and allow only fairly mundane vocalising to reach our ears. And the acting, which had seemed so relaxed and natural in the afternoon, was now strained and artificial in the extreme—the very epitome of so-called operatic acting.

Perhaps what was most evident was a sense of claustrophobia in the production. Only two scenes, the letter scene and the duel scene came across at all; the ballroom scenes were cramped and confined in the extreme.

The most intimate of mediums had taken its toll of an opera which, like Pushkin himself, cries out for freedom from restraint. Not that the production was terrible; quite the contrary. It was very fine, but not up to the standard of the Turn of the Screw, telecast last year.

The production's chief asset was Ilona Kombrink as Tatiana. A beautiful woman with a beautiful voice and some acting ability, Miss Kombrink made the Letter Scene an unforgettable experience.

John Alexander as Lensky sang beautifully, but was most affected by the TV medium. His acting was forced and unconvincing. Morley Meredith, despite the fact that he did not fully capture the Weltschmerz of the poet, nevertheless contributed a fine performance throughout.

Osip Hoshlyak, as Prince Gremin, with a voice vaguely like Boris Christoff's, sang his major aria with delicacy of feeling.

Thanks to Peter Ustinov's wonderful rendition of the poetry, the confusing gaps in the opera were glossed over, and helped immeasurably in making the evening a great, if not total, success.

Warren Wilson.

Excavations

Tickets go on sale today at the Hart House and Trinity porter's lodges for the Trinity Drama Society's production of "The Cave Dwellers".

The production will run Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of next week in the Hart House theatre. Tickets cost $1.25.

Ruth Ann Scott and Tom Drew-Brook will star as King and Queen in Trinity's first major production of the year.

Booths will be set up in college coffee shops next week.

Drama Society officials last night warned that "a distinguished visitor from the North who has consented to take a small part in the play will tour the campus Friday hoping to meet students who will be attending the play".

President Bissell Predicts:

Revolution To Avoid Catastrophe

U of T President Claude T. Bissell yesterday told business leaders gathered here to discuss educational problems the race "between education and catastrophe" has now become a "desperate truth."

Opening a conference of more than 30 businessmen at U of T, Dr. Bissell said, "The economic dimensions of education are changing rapidly and in a few years will go through what constitutes a revolution."

"The enormous sums that must be invested in higher education in themselves give the businessman the right to hold convictions about higher education," he said.

"More and more students are pouring into our universities—and it is futile to think in terms of any policy of rigid restriction," he said.

By HARVEY SHEPHERD
Varsity News Editor

Any solution to these problems, he said, must be qualified by four basic assumptions plus three which apply especially to the U of T.

First, he said, the university must "be essentially a centre of scholarship,"—both in the arts and professional departments. He said, "Universities should be carefully distinguished from junior colleges, technological institutes and centres for adult education."

Next, the university should stress the "why" over the "how", Dr. Bissell said. "The demand to devote more and more time in the university years to practical experience springs out of a misunderstanding of the nature of a practical education."

"What we need," the U of T President said, "is more emphasis on the full utilization of our students and less concern about the full utilization of our physical plant."

Thirdly, he said, certain disciplines should not be developed at the expense of others and fourthly "there must be a balance between a consciousness of the present and an interest in the elucidation of the past."

The U of T, Dr. Bissell said, has special responsibilities because of its "national eminence". It has received a substantial amount of aid, both governmental and private, has a "relative antiquity on the Canadian scene," and because of its geographical position "enjoys ease of communication with the great eastern universities in the United States."

Also, he said, the U of T, as a national university, has a "double responsibility toward graduate and undergraduate work."

Staff, for instance, must be selected to both make a "good teaching group" and "be men and women of absolutely first-class scholarly distinction." "The same double standards," he said, "apply to equipment and buildings," such as the library.

Finally, he said, the U of T must deal with its great size.

Although a large university, the U of T has always preserved "the small unit" and given stress to the residential side of university life, he said.

Our expansion problem, then, is not a problem in logistics," he said, "but an adventure in the development of a human society."

Blues Away For Gruelling Series

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

The hockey Blues departed yesterday at noon for Colorado. Scheduled for a gruelling four-game exhibition series, Blues play Denver University Pioneers tomorrow and Tuesday, while meeting the Colorado College Tigers on Saturday and Monday.

Last year Colorado Springs defeated Varsity 12-5 in the first encounter, while an injury-riddled Blues managed a 2-2 tie in the second game. Pioneers edged Blues 4-3, and 6-4 in their two games.

The altitude bred drFME r. The altitude in Colorado is far from conducive to good hockey for teams not accustomed to it. Varsity players required oxygen after only a minute turn on the ice.

To add to this, Blues were informed upon arrival, that the series against the Tigers was to be a total-point affair for the North American College Hockey Championship.

Now that just happens to jar us a bit. Somewhere along the line, someone is working on a huge assumption.

North America is a pretty vast continent, containing many colleges, and particularly in Canada, many fine college-hockey teams.

Colorado may have had the championship American college team the year previous to meeting Varsity. NCAA championship statistics which we possess however, do not appear to verify this.

Deer Stops Allen's Skein

The Junior Intramural wrestling tournament concluded with seven champions being crowned. Four of five matches were won by pins. There was one decision and two winners were declared by default.

The most exciting match of the evening was in the 157-pound class where Pat Allen, wrestling his third contest in two days, was pinned by capable Ken Deer.

The 177-pound division also witnessed a lively match, where Terry Wensley pinned Heino Holling.

Tony Barone, displaying exceptional strength for his size, flattened Ken Brown to cop the 147-pound laurels.

The 167-pound crown went to Roy Sinkus after he pinned Tony Copping.

The only decision was registered by Jack Shelegy when he bested Larry Arue for the 191-pound title.

Heavyweight Gerry Druchock and 137-pound Don Donner were the only inactive titlists, both winning by the default route.

The Senior wrestling Blues have been working out for the last month. This Friday they get their first test when they tangle with a select team from the Toronto YMCA. Starting time of the matches is 8 p.m. in Hart House.

Blues won the Ontario-Quebec College championship the year before, but there was no definite proof they could repeat the feat, nor was it ever boasted by Varsity that Blues were All-Canadian college champions.

Continent-wide championships, we feel, should not be treated so lightly, although the idea, if properly executed, is excellent.

We would really like to see a championship series between the winner of our league, and the college leagues which do exist in both Eastern and Western Canada.

We would like to see the playoffs at the end of the season, when the representatives have earned their laurels, and don't depend on the performance of the previous season's team. There can be too many player changes after a season is over to guarantee the calibre of the club for the next year.

We should also like to see an affair of this stature played alternately. One year the Canadian champs should play at home, and only in every second year should it be played in the United States of America.

UC Wins 13-8

University College, led by Bert Naylor's seven-goal performance, whipped Dentistry, 13-8, last night to move into the intramural lacrosse final against St. Mike's.

John Kennedy was Denis' top scorer with five goals.

First game of the final will be played Friday at 1 p.m. in the Lower Gym, with the second carded for Monday — same time, same place.

A third game, if necessary, will be played next Wednesday.

Trinity Panthers Win Soccer Championship

Trinity College Black Panthers won the intramural soccer title with a hard-fought, 4-1 win over the Irish of St. Michael's on a snow-covered Front Campus Tuesday afternoon.

The final had originally been scheduled for last Friday, but a heavy snowfall Friday morning forced postponement of the game until Tuesday.

Chris Carr, who played with the intermediate Baby Blues this season, and saw some action with the Blues, led Panthers on the score sheet with two goals.

George Meikle and Witold Weynerowski netted the other Trinity goals, while Paul Czaros counted the lone Double Blue marker.

Carr stalked Panthers to a 1-0 lead, and goals by Weynerowski and Meikle raised it to 3-0 before Czaros counted the St. Mike's score shortly before half time.

At the half, consultation was held between the two captains and referee Paul Avis as to whether or not to continue the game because of poor ground conditions.

The match went on, however, and Carr's second goal — the only score of the second half — put Trinity into a commanding lead they held until the final gun.

Panthers have been challenged by Wycliffe, the Division Two champions, but due to the lateness of the season and the inclement weather conditions, the game will probably not be played.

Trinity played the last part of the match without star veteran Hal Davies, who suffered torn ligaments in his knee in a collision on the slippery field.

In intramural hockey play yesterday, Victoria held the highly touted St. Mike's defending champions to a 1-1 tie, but lost the services of forward Gil Bennett in the process.

Bennett suffered a dislocated shoulder in the game. It is not known how long he will be missing from Coach Al Fleming's Red and Gold lineup.

Hodgson netted the Victoria goal, while Quinn potted the Irish marker.

Skule Sevens whipped Meds Fours 5-1, in other hockey play. Davis led the winners with two goals, while Brook, Perkins and Clarke added singles. Hall netted the lone Doctors' tally.

In squash play, Victoria Firsts edged St. Mike's A, 2-1, and the Double Blue's A volleyball team defaulted their match to University College Beta Sigs.

Tuesday night at Parkdale gymnasium, Andy's Athletic Club handed the Varsity basketball Blues defeat number two by the tune of 54-52.

The score was close throughout the loosely-played contest. Blues led 27-23 at halftime. The lead changed hands several times in the second period, with neither team able to build up any substantial lead.

Wowchuk, Karpinsky and Richters potted 10, nine and seven points respectively for the winners. Ruby Richman, Ezy Mandell and John Daeshyn notched most of Varsity's points.

Varsity has dropped two of three exhibition tilts. Sixteen players were used by coach John McManus. However, last night he announced that the squad had been pared to 13.

It was hoped the players cut would turn out for the Intermediate team.

The Blues host the West End Y Seniors 8:00 p.m. Friday at the Hart House gymnasium. Follow the Blues, turn out Friday.

No admission will be charged

Trinity Leads In Reed Trophy

Five colleges and faculties are engaged in one of the closest intramural high-point championship races in years, according to statistics released yesterday by Kay Boyd, secretary to the intramural athletic director.

Trinity College currently holds a slim, 55-point margin over runner-up St. Michael's, but it was only the Double Blue's second default of their top volleyball team yesterday that dropped them below Trinity in the standings.

Skule is a close third, with 5426 points, followed by Medicine with 5079 and University College with 4933. Victoria College and Dentistry trail far behind.

Wycliffe holds a solid lead in Division Two with 5885 points. In second place, with 4257, is Forestry, trailed by Knox at 3750 and Law at 3577.

In Division One, SPS has been in first place until the soccer final Tuesday, when St. Mike's gained runner-up points to move into their short-lived lead, and Trinity's university championship points boosted them from fourth to second place.

It goes almost without saying that a coach who wishes to be successful in his chosen undertaking must have the ability to converse intelligently about his sport.

But it is of real credit when the coach is willing to step beyond the bounds of what some people would call "propriety" in efforts to increase the value and success of his sport.

We sat down the other night for a few moments with Varsity swimming coach Bill Yorzyk, and left his company realizing somewhat better how our favorite gal felt the other morning when she found the front door locked in the wee, small hours.

If Bill Yorzyk could engineer what he is firmly convinced is the proper attitude towards swimming on this campus, the aquamen would join the ranks of those competitors known as participants in "major sports."

Honest, sincere, and genuinely enthused over the potential swim stars on the Varsity greens, Bill is struggling against those factors which, of necessity, boost football, hockey and basketball teams and let other sports slide along on their own momentum.

But, as Bill so correctly pointed out, that momentum is grinding slowly to a halt.

The aforementioned "major sports" are emphasized for two big reasons: First, they are traditionally crowd-pleasers; and second, they form a good part of the financial backbone of the University of Toronto Athletic Association.

Those are formidable odds for one man to face, particularly when that man admits to being a "poor, struggling university student" like the rest of us. (Well, most of us, anyway.)

But Bill Yorzyk is willing to tackle the situation, and after talking to him for a few moments, we're convinced the logic behind his drum-beating is worthy of mention.

His request for the swim team is two-fold. First, a wish for an improved exhibition schedule; and second, better practice accommodation for members of the Varsity swim team.

"Our schedule this season is, to put it mildly, terrible. We're up against teams that we slaughtered last season, and usually without trying. There should be more competition against better American colleges.

"We could bring University of Michigan up here for a triple meet with Western. I'm convinced the fans would turn out and pack Hart House. And if a return match were necessary, my guys would walk to Ann Arbor if they had to," Bill commented.

"As far as practice times go, there is one place that it really hurts. I've got several swimmers who would give their right arm to try for the Pan-American, British Empire or Olympic Games, but when can they practice?"

"We need what time we do have in the pool to prepare for our own meets, and we've got to have water to practice in. I've got no use for the theory that a swimming team can condition out of the water; it can't be done," he continued.

(That situation may be alleviated somewhat when the new Women's Athletic Building is completed next year, as the team has been promised use of the 75 by 42 foot pool for meets and for one night's practice a week.)

It will help, but not much. And by the time the Men's Athletic Building — still on the planning board — is completed, Bill Yorzyk will be gone from our midst, and swimming instruction may have fallen into the hands of someone who is content to accept the concessions which are handed him.

It is right now that we should sit back and take a long, hard look at swimming on this campus, and at one person who is fighting tooth and nail to put the sport in the position it deserves (particularly after the record-shattering 1957-58 season).

What can be done without demanding dollars and cents? From our humble position, may we offer a few suggestions:

● Stagger starting times of basketball games and swim meets so they don't conflict, and there can be a packed gallery in the Hart House pool (which there will be if there are no distractions elsewhere in the athletic wing)

● Make an effort to import top-notch competition for the Blues. They've got the personnel to battle any swim team unit right to the wire. If visiting teams demand a guarantee, charge a special admission price to the pool — it's amazing the number of people who will attend even if they have to pay.

● Attempt to regard swimming with the credit it deserves. The line between "major" and "minor" sports is far too flexible to use that as an excuse.

This weekend, Blues travel to Buffalo State for an exhibition meet (last year's score? a close 76-10), and journey to Hamilton Saturday for the Ambitious City's annual Christmas Carnival meet.

Coach Yorzyk leads his charges back into action at Hart House on Friday, December 12, with Western Mustangs in town for a sneak preview of the intercollegiate situation.

Mark that date in your little black book and, as an afterthought, put in the starting time — 8 o'clock.

all points except those to be gained in the lacrosse finals, and the volleyball season and final points. Entry points are included for all sports except basketball and water polo.

Sir George Students Doubt Motive Of Duplessis Move To Meet Reps

MONTREAL (CUP) — Scepticism and cynicism greeted Quebec Premier Maurice Duplessis' decision to meet with student representatives; a poll at Sir George William's College indicates.

Taken before yesterday's meeting with Duplessis, the poll showed most students were hopeful of some benefits, but doubted the premier's motives.

"Could be that M. Duplessis will break his heart as well as his pocket-book and try to help underprivileged students who are capable of securing higher education," said one student. "Perhaps Mr. Duplessis believes that a snap election would be won in this manner."

"We will have to get something," another student suggested.

But in most of their comments there was a note of suspicion and suggestions of political expediency.

By meeting the student delegation, after a year's delay, "he can deprive Mr. Lesage (Liberal Leader) and others of the opportunity to say that he has been as much of an autocrat in this affair as he has been in others," one freshmen arts student said.

Another freshman called the move a step in the right direction. "The initial results of this meeting may not accomplish much, but the establishment of some sort of relations is laudable."

Queen's-Varsity Match Sparks AMS Check-Up

KINGSTON (CUP) — Student drinking bouts and football weekend "exhibitionism" will be investigated by the Queen's University Alma Mater Society.

The investigation was sparked after complaints to the executive following the Queen's - Varsity game at Varsity Stadium.

The president of the Ontario Federation of School Athletic Associations complained about actions of Queen's students during the game.

The students' drinking and "exhibitionism" gave a poor example and a bad idea of university life to many high school football players watching the game after the annual Red Feather Tournament, he said.

The executive decided to take action after this complaint and after several bills for damage on football weekends.

The AMS executive established a committee to examine problems of policing the game with the present AMS constable system. The committee is to investigate the efficiency of the system and possibilities for improving it.

China Canada's Only Slip British Sage Tells House

By ED ROBERTS
Varsity Staff Reporter

A well-known economist and political scientist last night told Hart House members Canada's stand on Red China's admission to the United Nations is the only issue on which he foreign policy has foundered.

Prof. Robert T. McKenzie, news analyst at the London School of Economics and author of a definitive work on British political parties, told students at the Hart House debate "Canada is one of the most level-headed, enlightened and dispassionate the world has in solving its problems."

"There is only one area in which she has gone astray", he said, "Canada should support the admission of the People's Republic of China to the United Nations".

Mr. McKenzie, Honorary Visitor at the debate, charged "immense opposition from the United States," for Canada's failure to support such a step.

"Privately I believe Canada's leaders, of both political parties, realize they must support Red China's admission. But they have been deterred from taking such a step by the stand of the US State Department".

"U.S. policy in the Far East has been the one great gap in their foreign policy since the last war", he said.

"U.S. leaders are becoming more and more aware to the fact they will have to admit Red China, but their position is analogous to that of many politicians in the South".

"In the same way that any Southern politician who supported integration publicly, or even said it was inevitable, would be dead politically — U.S. statesmen don't dare support Red China's cause", he said.

The House supported the resolution, "that Canada should support the admission of the People's Republic of China to the United Nations" by a vote of 53 to 20.

L. V. Gray (II Law), first speaker for the Ayes, said "since the UN is a body designed basically for communication between nations, the 650 million people in Red China should be represented in the UN".

"Our adherence to a static policy means that our decisions are made for us by others. Therefore we must make a positive move and support Red China's admission", he said.

"In this whole matter Canada should act in her usual role of intermediary, and should support the admission of Red China".

First speaker for the Noes D. C. Ross (I Law) said a policy of supporting China's admission would amount to a recognition of Red China.

"Such a policy is fraught with peril. We should examine our charts before turning the ship of state about and steering it on such a course", he said.

W. C. Graham (II Trin), second speaker for the Ayes, said the old notion that "the heathen Chinese is the dread of the East and all contact with him must be avoided" should be discarded.

"If we admit Red China to the United Nations it will show all our allies in South-East Asia that we back down on our oft-repeated word", M. B. Wallace (I UC) the second speaker for the Noes claimed.

Wycliffe Captures Coed In Giant, Joyful Auction

Wycliffe invaded Trinity yesterday in their annual expedition to augment Share's coffers while contesting for a girl to represent the entirely masculine college.

Their bid of $40 won pretty freshman Nancy Brownridge for the theological college. Trinity's class of 6T2 beat out the Wycliffe men in a fight for Margo Malden, I Trin, the other coed auctioned off for Share in the Buttery.

Other items put under the gavel included $1 shots of brandy, two cans of saki, a bottle of Guinness (with mug) and assorted bottles of beer.

Sophomore St. Hildians snatched up a door to R. J. Potts (I Trin) room, and Wycliffe lost the bidding on their college gate.

Wycliffe contributions to the auction included baseball gloves, four skates and a stuffed skin object tentatively identified as "the head of John the Baptist".

Auctioneers Harold Davies (III Trin) and Tom Drew-Brook (IV Trin) brought in $156 for Share.

The auction was so successful that it will be continued tomorrow at 1 p.m. in the Buttery, officials said.

Meanwhile last night the Share rivalry between Trinity and St. Michael's College was pointed up in the predominance of Trinity's red and black in an SMC fashion show in Brennan Hall.

St. Mike's coeds modelled fashions by Yera Worth as the side-light to a mammoth draw of raffle tickets by television singer Bob Goulet.

A $50 first prize was won by Art Dollworth, and the second prize Shop's food hamper was claimed by J. A. McGiffey.

The fashion show and raffle draw was followed by a draw. (?) SMC also plans a Monte Carlo night for Share in Brennan Hall.

Tickets will be given away Friday night under the direction of Mickey Spillane (III SMC).

CBC Telecast Boost HH Musical Offering

A new series of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation Concerts will begin in the Hart House Great Hall Wednesday night—and 350 U of T students are invited to attend the concert free.

The concert will be broadcast live from the Hall and will feature violinist Ruggerio Ricci who has appeared on concert stages all over the world and is recently returned from a tour of Latin America.

The actual concert will last from 8-10 p.m. The first 35 minutes will be taped for CBC use later and, after intermission, the 9-10 p.m. portion of the concert will be broadcast from the Hall.

The concert series, sponsored jointly by the CBC and the HH music committee, will consist of four concerts, about one a month.

Pete Brawley, HH music committee chairman last night said the Series will boost the yearly number of concerts in the Hall to 17 from the eight yearly Hart House Sunday evening performances of a few years ago.

Hart House Orchestra Association concerts also help to hike the total, he said.

Complementary tickets two to an Admit to Lectures card—are available at the HH hall porter's desk from 12-2 p.m. and from 5-6 p.m. today and at the same times Monday and Tuesday as long as they last.

Tickets will be given away on a first-come-first-served basis.

Share Still Shows Bad

Share campaign officials announced a five-day extension of the World University Service fund-raising campaign when faced with yesterday's "pathetic" returns.

Yesterday's grand total of $567.32 is almost $450 below last year's total at this time. The returns are "certainly below what we expected", WUS co-chairman Sue Evans said last night.

"We don't think student assets are down that much from last year," she said. Miss Evans appealed to faculty and college representatives to "get the personal touch and some action into the campaign" and to declare returns in the Students' Administrative Council office.

The campaign will be extended until Wednesday in an attempt to make the $13,000 goal, she said.

Campaign officials "hope the figures are not truly indicative of what's happening", WUS co-chairman Keith Hoilett said last night.

"We're looking for a dramatic increase in the next couple of days," he said.

With Engineering and Medicine earmarking their funds for special projects, nine faculties have yet to declare any returns to campaign officials.

Well, Hmm..

Ancient Works Better Than Literature Today

Study of rhetoric enables theatre", the first of a series of three lectures sponsored by St. Michael's Senate Club and Students' Administrative Council.

Prof. Grube traced oratory back to the works of Homer from whom the Greeks drew their rhetorical figures and illustrations.

But it was not until the coming of the Sophists that these techniques were named and classified, he said.

"It should be remembered that even until the fourth century A.D. silent reading was rare. All writing was thought of as spoken, and reading of any kind meant reading aloud or having a slave read to you."

Prof. Grube mentioned the contributions made to oratory by the Sophists as far as Isocrates and his "balanced clauses."

Thucydides, he said, was out of the stream of this influence; in his deliberate refusal to follow the techniques of the rhetorical theorists so that his was "a coarse, but awesome beauty of language, hewn from stone."

Prof. Grube also stressed the orators' tendency to concentrate on the emotions of juries, making their literary formula too narrow. This resulted in regimentation and the production of technicians who in turn influenced "the art of history" to its detriment, he said.

"History had either to escape into poetry or to fall into the class of display oratory. History was not seen as an art form, but this was the fault of the philosophers and not of the rhetoricians," Professor Grube said.

Sac Approves Draft On Tax Deduction Of Fees

The National Affairs Committee of the Students' Administrative Council last night gave tentative approval to a draft of a brief which is to ask the Canadian government to deduct university fees from the taxable income of students.

The draft was presented by Joe Houston, committee member who has been working with a committee of the Canadian Association of Medical Students and Internes which is sponsoring the brief.

CAMSI is asking for the National Association of Canadian University Students to co-sponsor the brief. The National Affairs committee which handles all Nficus business for the SAC, voted to forward the draft to Nficus national headquarters.

The brief is also to ask that the wife of a university student be allowed to list him as a dependent and receive a $400 exemption if he makes less than $950 taxable income annually.

Also to be requested is an income tax deduction for money spent on books and instruments.

Houston said a more detailed version of the proposed brief will be presented at a later date. Committee chairman Bob Lee said the committee will probably vote on it then.

The committee also voted to write Memorial University, Newfoundland, expressing interest in a trans-Canada university radio broadcast proposed by the students' council of that university.

Preparations were also made to set in motion machinery for handling U of T entries in the Nficus annual short story contest.

Committee members also heard a report by members Don Morin and Barb Leaman on the Nficus seminar on the role of the university in national affairs in London, Ontario this fall and discussed plans for the Nficus Ontario regional conference Jan. 23-25.

T.V. Debut

Utdu vs McGill Contest Pacifism

U of T debaters will make a television debut in January.

Two members of the U of T Debating Union will grapple with McGill University debaters Jan. 4 on the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.'s national telecast program, "Citizen's Forum."

Topic for debate will be "Resolved, that there is a new case for pacifism." The broadcast will last for half an hour, and will be repeated on a 45 minute radio broadcast several days later.

CBC officials want an audience of 100 students for the 3 p.m. telecast from Victoria College's Alumni Hall. About 30 students from Toronto high schools which have participated in UTDU high school tours will be invited to attend. Questions from the floor will be encouraged during the telecast.

The program supplies pamphlets on the topic to Citizen's Forum panels through Canada for private discussion.

The telecast is "a tremendous opportunity for our debaters and U of T students to show the Canadian audience that university education in Canada still compares more than favorably with the Russian," Linda Silvers, UTDU public service debates director, said last night.

UTDU will also send out invitations this week-end for Toronto's debating tournament Jan. 23-5.

About 20 Canadian and American universities will be invited to participate in the tournament, Miss Silvers said.

Bienvenue Encore:

Laval 12 Arrive

Twelve enthusiastic students from Quebec's Laval University will descend on Toronto today as part of an exchange with St. Michael's College.

The Quebec students will spend the week-end at discussions, classes, dances and parties with their SMC hosts.

All university students are welcome to a Laval welcoming dance tonight in Brennan-Hall. Refreshments will be served.

SMC students will return to Quebec City in February during Laval's Winter Carnival to complete the exchange program.

The exchange was dreamed up last year when a group of SMC students organized by the college French Club went to Laval for the Winter Carnival.

The group was officially welcomed and entertained by Laval, and SMC students returned determined to set up an exchange.

Students hope to be able to extend the week-end into a few years. The University Students' Administrative Council decided at the last minute this year not to take the week-end under its wing, but left the way open for such action in future years.

Present Generation In Age Of Non-Angularity

Angularity went down to defeat at St. Michael's College yesterday in an Oratorical Society debate.

By a vote of 14-9 SMC students awarded top honors to the affirmative in a debate on "Resolved, that this generation is a conformist generation."

John McIntyre, arguing for the affirmative, said the present generation is noted for its conformity in clothing. SMC students conform when they refuse to venture "across campus," he said.

Dick Tan cited recent admission of four women to the House of Lords as a sign that this generation is not conformist. Albert Einstein, Brigitte Bardot and Jayne Mansfield are all noted non-conformists, he said.

Einstein is the exception to the rule, Francine Gremse argued for the affirmative. Conformity is a basic characteristic of Russian scientists, she said. As an example of conformity, Miss Gremse limited her speech to the exact five minutes specified in the house debates rules.

Edie Smith, second speaker for the negative, said she herself is not a conformist because she had missed a lecture to attend the debate.

Accusing the college of conformity, Peter Dembski said speaking from the floor that Thomism has replaced Christianity at the college.

Staff Loses Chess Meet

Last night students emerged the winners of a staff-student chess meet by a score of 7½-2½. The meet was sponsored by the Hart House Chess Club.

The staff has not won a meet since 1951. Last night's score was the highest ever recorded against them.

Dave Grimshaw (1 UC), Ontario junior chess champion, was on the student team. On the staff team was Dr. W. P. Wallace, University College classics professor, who has been on 34 consecutive staff teams.

The students won seven games, lost two, and tied one.

-a special report on

Russian Education Programs

Sputnik And The Reason Why

The Handwriting . . .

. . . on the wall

In spite of all the recent fuss about Russian advances in technological education, there has been little detailed comparison of Canadian and Russian curricula. This report attempts to fill this gap.

Anthony Frisch, who prepared the report, was born of Austrian parents in Naples, Italy in 1921. He studied science at Emmanuel College, Cambridge and McGill University.

To his scientific experience is added poetic talent; he was awarded the Chester McNaughten Prize for Poetry by McGill University and the E. J. Pratt Prize & Award by the University of Toronto and is the author of 5 volumes of poetry.

His work took a broadly educational turn when he edited First Flowering, a selection of poetry and prose by Canadian high school students, followed by Prisoners Speak, a collection of poems and stories by inmates of penal institutions of the English-speaking world.

To prepare himself to do a detailed comparative report of the teaching of mathematics and science in Canada and Russia he taught for two years at Pickering College, Newmarket, then acquired an Ontario teaching certificate and taught for another two years in an Ontario high school.

Meanwhile he was gathering material. The facts of curricula in the ten provinces come from the Provincial Ministers of Education. With the help of the Minister of Trade and Commerce he acquired East German textbooks and through the Department of External Affairs a set of Russian science and mathematics texts from Moscow. This material forms the core of the report.

However at this point the support he had received vanished. A Toronto publishing firm that had accepted his report and published advertising material suddenly refused to publish it. Speaking engagements on which Frisch largely depends to make his ideas known were not forthcoming.

Tony Frisch can not help looking at this cool reception as part of a general freezing-out of the discussion of education in Canada. A few items in this freeze out are these:

1. Frisch has learned of a comparative report prepared privately for the Royal Military Academies of Canada. The report is supposed to prove that the Provincial School system reduces the quality of students coming into the military academies. However, the report has not been published. Since, Frisch says, its publication might injure Dominion-Provincial relations, it must be suppressed.

2. Dominion-Provincial relations also have their effect on parliament. Frisch has been told that MP's are being instructed by their party whips not to discuss education in parliament.

3. Most Canadian publishers publish high school textbooks. They might be reluctant to publish material that would make these texts obsolete.

There may be answers to all of these conjectures. But they are worth considering.

Meanwhile Tony Frisch has a vitally important axe to grind and he is not stopping. He is currently compiling the results of an educational questionnaire he sent to each state of the United States and 56 other countries.

Tony Frisch, among others, is devoted to the improvement of education in Canada. His report, part of which appears on the next two pages deserve the attention of all who are as devoted as he is.

Works of WUS

The West Indies

By PROF. A. J. EARP

Professor A. J. Earp, Registrar and Dean of Residence at Trinity College, is Chairman of the WUS Business and Finance Committee. He was formerly a lecturer in Classics at the University of the West Indies in Jamaica.

The West Indies, although one of the world's underdeveloped areas, is not among those countries included in the SHARE campaign, because the few hundred students who attend its only University are a comparatively privileged group, for whom the problems which WUS assists are no more serious than they are for most of us. Indeed these problems are likely to be much more acute for some of the West Indians studying in Canada, of whom there are now more than a thousand.

However, the area is of special interest to WUS of Canada as the site of next year's summer seminar. Staff and students selected from almost every campus in the country will assemble for an orientation period here before flying to the University College of the West Indies in Jamaica. There, in what must surely be one of the loveliest settings of any University, they will meet with their West Indian counterparts, and representatives of other Caribbean countries, to discuss the implications of self-government, with particular reference to the new West Indies Federation.

Problems of politics and government abound on both the federal and island level. How are islands scattered over a thousand miles of ocean to become a nation and how can they support themselves? The central government for the first five years, at least, has very limited powers and a minimal budget of nine million West Indian dollars (a third of which must go to maintain the University at its present level). Island loyalties and aspirations are strong, especially in Jamaica. Good government alone cannot be relied upon to retain votes in a country with universal suffrage but extensive illiteracy, and its complement of political opportunists. Basic to the problems of government are those of economics. Throughout the West Indies it is obvious that much needs to be done; it is not nearly so obvious how the necessary development programmes are to be financed. While there has been some diversification of the economy it is still predominantly agricultural and heavily dependent upon sugar, or in some of the small islands upon other single crops such as nutmeg and arrowroot. Meanwhile the growth of population far exceeds the rate of development and emigration outlets to anywhere but the United Kingdom remain barred.

In education the main needs are at the secondary and technical levels. West Indian grammar schools have long been noted for their academic competence, but only scholarship winners receive free tuition — and the goal of free secondary schooling is not yet in sight. Provision for technical instruction is still hopelessly inadequate, yet a developing economy cries out for trained technicians. University education is a lesser problem since over three thousand West Indians are studying abroad, mostly without assistance from their governments, but the role of the University College itself is a subject of controversy; should it concentrate upon an elite of academic excellence or should it immediately extend its influence as widely as it can? Again, however, the question is very largely one of financial resources.

The WUS group which concentrates upon West Indian social structure and cultural activity should find this especially fascinating. What is remarkable is the advance made within the last few years towards a society where colour is of no account. In the words of Norman Manley, Jamaica's Chief Minister: "With us it is ceasing to be a matter of tolerance, as tolerance itself supposes there is something to be tolerated. It is that we are steadily and rapidly becoming a community in which these differences do not have any significance at all, in which acceptance and tolerance are not the words. We are truly learning each to be a part of the other without consideration of other than natural human feeling, affection and respect."

Canadian students will also see a peasant society which is one of the heritages of slavery, and they will learn the reasons why the social pattern is very different from that which they have come to take for granted.

They will see, too, some evidence of the burgeoning of a West Indian culture expressing itself with a freedom and exuberance by West Indian artists and novelists alike. The real folk songs of the area reflect the colourful heritage of African, French, Spanish and British which is the West Indies.

In all these fields the Canadian group will doubtless find much of which they will be critical. But they will, I think, learn to view these things in a perspective wider than that of their own communities at home and see that in the West Indian context these are not the things that count so much as the determination with which they are being met and the progress, admittedly belated, which is now being made against them.

the World this Week

The world's news this week began with tragedy. Raging flames that may have originated with a carelessly dropped cigarette or the work of an arsonist, whipped through Our Lady of Angels Roman Catholic School in Chicago.

When the debris had cooled and a count taken, 90 children and teachers were dead and some 85 more in hospital out of a total enrolment of 1,700.

The future of Germany remained the centre of international news. Monday saw the announcement of plans by the United States to meet with its allies and with the Soviets to discuss the future of the divided central European power and of its chief city, Berlin.

What was needed was an adequate answer to the ticklish proposals made by Russian Premier Khrushchev who suggested neutralization of West Berlin and the creation of a neutral confederation of East and West Germany.

Moscow answered that if round-table talks on the situation did not get under way within six months the Soviets would act themselves to end the four-power control of Berlin. By Wednesday, however, Russia had denounced the proposed talks as a Western attempt to shoot down Moscow's ideal plan.

Meanwhile in the East German Parliament, 400 members of the Volkshammer rose in startling unanimity to endorse the Soviet scheme.

In Canada, the outcome of two contests were top news at the start of the week. In Winnipeg, that city's Blue Bombers upset and trounced the favored Hamilton Ti-Cats for the first victory. In Toronto, Nathan Phillips was returned easily for his fourth term as mayor as heavy snows kept elvic voting light.

In Winnipeg's strife-torn United College, there were signs of a settlement in the air this week. With the resignation Dec. 2 of a member of the college's senate following those of five professors, signs were the narrow-minded college administration might yet be forced into reinstating Professor Harry Crowe dismissed on the strength of a personal letter stolen from the mails.

At the end of the week, two provincial matters were earning headlines. One, especially significant for University voters in Toronto's St. Paul's riding was the appointment of Hon. Roland Michener, speaker of the House of Commons to the ambassadorship to Washington yesterday.

The second item, a nice problem for lawyers to puzzle over, was the decision by Ontario Chief Justice J. C. McRue that careless driving laws are invalid because they trespass on federal legislation.

Mark Nichols

three years behind

Anthony Frisch is not the first man to say that Canadian education is far behind Soviet education in mathematics and science.

But he has supplemented that opinion with a set of detailed tables that cannot be ignored.

In table form the facts strike with depressing and frightening power and conclusions force themselves forward with much more impact than ever before.

The most obvious conclusion is, in Tony Frisch's words, that "generally we trail the Soviet three years in mathematics and two years in science."

But he also draws a less obvious but possibly more important conclusion; the fact of the great disparity in curricula within Canada.

For instance, where the Soviet student takes 71 units of mathematics and science in the course of his secondary school training, the Ontario student takes 54 units and the Newfoundland student takes 27. In other words there is more disparity in mathematics and science training between Newfoundland and Ontario than there is between Ontario and the Soviet.

These facts suggest that before Canadian education can begin to meet the Soviet challenge, something must be done to standardize curricula across Canada.

In his suggestions Frisch follows this line of thought out to what may be its logical conclusion. Since, according to the British North America Act, the national government can take charge of education only by declaring a state of emergency, he suggests that the national government should, in fact, declare such state of emergency and take over education across Canada as a preliminary step to raising national standards.

There are people more capable than we are to decide whether this is the solution to the problem. It is definitely one possible solution.

What we are mainly interested in doing is not so much choosing one solution or another as describing the danger as we see it.

And whether or not the government chooses to declare one, it seems obvious that a "state of emergency" does actually exist.

It is an emergency for teachers, for national and provincial Departments of Education, and for the public.

If they do not yet recognize the magnitude of the emergency we hope they give Anthony Frisch's report the careful study we think it deserves.

And we hope it hits them hard.

A

Jewish

I believe that the essence of my Jewish faith can best be sensed, to paraphrase the Hebrew diction, in three areas — those of study, worship and charity.

Judaism means to me a preoccupation with study — all study in general and study of Jewish sources in particular. Judaism represents a positive abhorrence of illiteracy, a sincere reverence for scholarship, and an absolute passion for study. The attainment of knowledge is one of the highest achievements that men can hope for. Study, in Judaism, is not a province peculiar to any particular group, but is rather a trait which each individual, be he who he may, is enjoined to cultivate. It represents on the one hand an affinity with the ineffable, a means of intuitively grasping that which is incomprehensible, and on a more mundane level, a key to the solution of man's problems. For the student there is a withdrawal from the temporal world, a dissipation of the time and space boundaries, so that the twentieth century Jew finds himself at one with his people and his history, imbued with the presence of his God.

The whole mortal life of the Jew is to me a part of an unending service of worship to his Creator, for here worship is synonymous with way of life — a way of life marked not so much by the sad and sombre attitude of the ascetic pietist, but rather by the enthusiasm and joy of one imbued with the wonders of life. The believing

Jew is much more than a man as in the frames of the question, a little of the dynamism, a little of the cognate, a little of the trait, a little of the concern, a little of the favour, a little of the God, a little of the den, a little of the life, a little of the him, a little of the choice.

Pearson Impressions

Dear Sir:

"The development of Canadian and U.S. interdependence demands a new category of relationships," stated Lester B. Pearson, at a public lecture at the University of Rochester. He insisted that the best possible long term solution to the increasing tensions between Canada and the U.S. would be the gradual development of a wider economic interdependence embracing the whole North Atlantic community.

Such was the stand taken by the Nobel Peace Prize winner during a three day seminar on "Canadian and American Relations in a divided world."

The student response during his lectures, seminars, and frequent gatherings reflected Mr. Pearson's quick-witted and informal manner.

Mr. Pearson rejected "the dream of a separate North American paradise." He stressed the necessity of a united economic front of all the free nations of the world to meet the new challenge of Communist economic competition.

He further emphasized the importance of viewing Canadian-U.S. frictions in a world setting, in order to mitigate competitive national aims.

Questions about Berlin, Red China and the Far East, The War of 1812, and current politics in Quebec, were also discussed by American students and Mr. Pearson. A French Canadian Professor travelling with Mr. Pearson, Maurice LaMontagne, added color to the controversial Quebec subject.

Once, when pressed by an American student for his opinion of John Foster Dulles — the diplomat and statesman, Mr. Pearson's wit got the better of him. He quickly retorted, "If I gave my opinion of John Foster Dulles I'd be no diplomat!"

Rochester hospitality shown by Professor Mason Wade, our host, provided a warm basis on which to observe the impact of Mr. Pearson's ideas on the University community.

Too little, too shallow, too late

The core of Anthony Frisch's report is contained in four tables respectively comparing Russian and Canadian education in terms of age under the headings of mathematics, physics, chemistry and biology. Two of these appear on this page. At the left side of each table the individual subjects are grouped according to the age at which they are studied in Russia. The grade listed beside the age of the Russian students denotes in Canadian grade terms the period at which Russians study the material in question. In the section of his report titled "Procedure" Tony Frisch writes:

"As much as possible, I tried to fit the depth of treatment into the list. For example, the Soviet student has 1½ years of Organic Chemistry, whereas Ontario gives three weeks of Organic Chemistry in Grade 13. While aldehydes are mentioned in the Ontario curriculum, their treatment does not correspond in depth to the Soviet curriculum. Consequently, aldehydes are marked with a clean dash (not taken) for Ontario."

A dash marks all those subjects that are not taken in Canadian secondary schools.

The report continues, "Similarly, though optics, for instance, are taught in Grades 11 and 13 in British Columbia, Grade 13 approximates the Soviet treatment and is marked as such.

In making the comparison I used the East German texts and checked them against the Russian texts. Russian children go to school at the age of seven and leave 10 years later at 17. East German children go to school at six years of age and leave 12 grades later at 18. I used the word "Soviet" to denote both Russian and East German values and procedures. And, needless to say, the Soviet curricula examined originate from schools attended by superior students who intend to follow university careers. Whereas in the University specialization occurs, at the secondary school level the heavy load of Soviet maths and sciences courses does not detract from an equally heavy load of courses in the basic humanities."

Of course Soviet education is not all purity and light. Up to Grade six Soviet students receive a subtle indoctrination in the Communist faith in every subject they study. Mr. Frisch includes translations from Russian primary school texts. When the subject is geography the students read this little essay about life in America.

I am an American negro boy. I have four older and three younger brothers and sisters. My father is a poor farmer. In the shed behind the house we keep an old horse and an underfed cow. The land we own is worked by my mother. In the spring she plows, plants, and hoes. Later she harvests, all by herself. You will ask why father and we children don't help mother. We would like to. However when we are six years old we must go with father at four a.m. to the other fields. They belong to the white squire. My brothers and sister pick almost as much cotton as the grown-ups, but we receive almost no money.

(Grade 2 Geography).

This kind of material is used in every subject from grammar to arithmetic. In high school the students pass on to some rather purer studies but their primary education has done its work.

A Rousing Hurrah For Blarney

The Last Hurrah (Imperial) is indeed a rouser. A well written, finely directed and brilliantly acted adaptation of Edwin O'Connor's best selling 1956 novel of the same title, it rates a high position on any list of the best films of 1958.

Set in an anonymous "New England town", which resembles Boston in everything but name, the picture is concerned with the last campaign of veteran politician Frank Skeffington, (Spencer Tracy), surely the most lovable machine politician ever to hit the screen.

Skeffington, many times Mayor and sometimes Governor, bears a remarkable resemblance to the late James Michael Curley, off-times Mayor of Boston, Governor of Massachusetts, and two-time convict (for fraud), a fact which was vehemently denied by author O'Connor in his defence against several libel suits. Denials or not, the story is about "Jim" Curley, the little boy who was born in the slums of south Boston and rose (Irish rose that is) to defeat the Beacon Hill Brahmins and become Mayor.

All the drama of that uniquely American institution, the old-fashioned machine campaign, is played out upon the screen, and is presented in an unforgettable manner. Politician Skeffington wheels and deals with a firm and practiced hand as he defeats each successive play of his enemies. The flint-hearted banker's refusal (for political reasons) to loan the money required to build a badly-needed slum area hospital is countered with what was surely one of the most ingenious political devices ever conceived: "The well-oiled machine swings into action and nobody is forgotten or overlooked in its workings."

Mass rallies are held with Skeffington giving forth with his "gift of the Blarney" to the waiting electorate. All the wonderful razzamatazz of the old time political campaign, the things which will be remembered after all the graft and corruption are forgotten, are brought to the screen. And even if the good Mayor does steal from the rich, "shure and tis only for to give to the poor."

Spencer Tracy turns in an Oscar-worthy performance as Skeffington, and in doing so evokes sentimental memories of bygone times in every member of the audience with just "a wee drop of the Irish" in his veins. Even his death bed scene, when all his cronies (friendly or otherwise) file by to pay their last respects is memorable: it could have easily been maudlin or morbid. Jeffrey Hunter turns in a capable, if somewhat hackneyed, performance as the young newspaperman. Brilliant character portraits by John Caradine as the vindictive Yankee newspaper-publisher who is out to get Skeffington at any cost, Basil Rathbone as the irate banker who supplies the cost, and Donald Crisp as the Cardinal, a lifetime friend of the Mayor's who still has a soft spot in his heart for the "old rascal", round out the highlights of a memorable cast.

John Ford's direction of the Frank Nugent-adapted script is topnotch.

Only two faults, one of them not to be blamed on the picture, must be noted. The first is Skeffington's defeat by young Kevin McCloskey (James Gleason), a political nonentity, and a perfect caricature of the young college graduate, war-hero, and family man who goes into politics with high ideals and not much else. As the Cardinal said, "a mealy mouthed, manoeuvrable piece of dough. Where are the best of our young men, the men who should be in government?"

The second failing is the public's. For some unaccountable reason, perhaps because of the poor attendance, "The Last Hurrah" closes to-night, after a one-week stand. Surely one of the year's best pictures can draw larger audiences than this when an abortion such as "In Love and War" can play to packed houses for two weeks. Perhaps after "The Last Hurrah" garners its share of the Oscars it will receive the public acclaim it deserves. E. M. Roberts

HHO A M O A

Aksel Schiotz-Ben Vennto

Aksel Schiotz, one of the foremost interpreters of German lieder in the world today, is an artist who has made one of the most amazing comebacks in musical history.

He was interrupted early in his career by the German occupation of Denmark, and joined the resistance movement, touring the various parts of the country giving concerts to keep up the morale of his countrymen. As a result, he was given the Order of Dannebrog by the late King Christian X after the war.

There followed tours of Norway, Sweden and England, and in 1946, he was invited to sing at the Clydebourne Festival by Benjamin Britten.

At the height of his fame, he was struck down by a tumor on the auditory nerve. The operation temporarily paralyzed one side of his face, robbed him of the sight of one eye and the hearing in one ear.

Yet within two years after this tragedy, he was once more giving recitals in his native Denmark, as well as in the United States.

In 1955, he joined the music faculty of the University of Minnesota, where he remained until this year, when a special post in German lieder was created especially for him at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

The celebrated artist, who can sing in Norwegian, Swedish, Danish, German, French, English, the language of the Faro Islands, and Russian (which he cannot read, but has learned by the sound system), has one major phobia: it is being considered a "local artist".

While in Minnesota, he approached the president of the Schubert club and offered to sing Schubert Lied at one meeting. "I'm sorry," was the reply, "but we don't use local artists." He hopes that when he goes back to the U of Minnesota to visit his family that he will now be considered as outside talent.

We heartily welcome Mr. Schiotz to Toronto and hope that his stay here will be as profitable and enjoyable for him as it is for us.

the wind can't read

THE WIND CANNOT READ (Odeon Hyland) is the Rank Organization's colourful, entertaining, and, at times, moving screen adaptation of Richard Mason's best-selling novel about the love affair between an R.A.F. officer and a beautiful Japanese girl in wartime India.

The story, imbued with travelogue overtones, has been filmed amid some of the most spectacular backgrounds ever seen in a British film: the serenely perfect Taj Mahal, Delhi's Red Fort, a fascinating native bazaar and the 1500-year-old ruined town of Jaipur. For box-office appeal, top producer-director team Betty Fox and Ralph Thomas have cinema idol Dirk Bogarde and a sensitive young Oriental, Yoko Tani.

Director Thomas, working with an excellent, comprehensive script by the original author, displays his mastery of suspense, irony, local colour and the skillful use of sound to create interest. The production, throughout, skirts the thin line between genuine emotion and maudlin sentimentality, but only in the overdirected and, painfully slushy conclusion, does it degenerate to the latter. Dirk Bogarde, always an actor to be enjoyed, shines in a role he truly understands. Yoko Tani's spectacular sensitivity is, at times, overshadowed by her annoying mannerisms and forced demure. Outstanding in a fine cast is Anthony Bushell who breathes the very essence of the proud but understanding British Brigadier.

Generally, this film is not only a beautiful travelogue; it is also a moving, if at times sentimental, insight into that illusive quantity known as "love."

HHOA

Once more, the plea goes forth from HHOA for your support! Once more, elmos has gone down upon his knees and swore that HHOA will fold and that the AM&D page will be to blame for thus forsaking him.

Two hundred single membership tickets still need to be sold in order that the Hart House Orchestra, under its brilliant conductor, Boyd Neel, carry on with its present season.

It is your duty to support this fine orchestra. If it folds, it will be a stain on this university. Get out to the all-Vivaldi program this Saturday.

Pale Pygmalion

Pygmalion was a Greek sculptor who brought a stone statue to life. In spite of its many delights the Crest theatre production of Shaw's Pygmalion manages to take a living play and turn it to stone.

Director Malcolm Black seems to have decided that since the play is now too old to be contemporary and is still too young to be a classic, the only way to do it is as a period piece. Hence the statuesque quality. Movements and speeches are calculatingly deliberate to a stifling degree.

Of course this may be the way to do it. Because the play is still tremendously funny and sometimes the period piece type treatment makes it even funnier. And there are fine individual performances.

Douglas Rain as Henry Higgins is full of ambiguous variety mainly because he wavers between the orthodox spoiled brat characterization and a more tongue-in-cheek Henry Higgins who acts spoiled just to see how people will react. The opening night audience reacted favorably.

Frances Hyland as Eliza, went through all the motions beautifully as only she can but there was a note of extremeness missing. In the Crest's kind of stylized and deliberately overblown production, her performance was too regular, perhaps too realistic.

Tony Van Bridge as Eliza's father Alfred Doolittle and Cosette Lee as Mrs. Pearce caught the spirit of the thing beautifully. Van Bridge's comic speech about "middle-class morality" was one of the finest moments of the evening. And William Needles in the not too exciting part of Colonel Pickering almost reached the same level.

The sets were not worth the long pauses it took to prepare them and the costumes although possibly justifiable on the period piece idea were dull.

On the whole the Crest's Pygmalion is a fine play. Someone should set it to music. Sam Aizenstat

Dramatic Event at Eaton Auditorium

One of the foremost interpreters of Bach played in Eaton Auditorium yesterday. It was a dramatic event. For pianist Rosalyn Tureck, the music of Bach is universal; it is the point from which all music is to be understood. For the listener, Madame Tureck translated into sound her convictions in a singularly compelling performance which embraced all the facets of keyboard artistry. Her musical ideas were so well integrated into a convincing whole that to single out any aspect of the performance is almost superfluous. But the great gift of Tureck lies in the fact that she can completely hold her audience despite any stylistic or interpretive differences of opinion. In any case, there is no mistaking Rosalyn Tureck's love for the old master.

Understandable then, was the breath-taking C major prelude from Book I of the Well Tempered Clavier which was taken at a deliberate slow tempo. Unswayed by Gounod, the resonant bass notes, matchless gradations of tone and subtle harmonic changes effected a peculiar mystical feeling which rose softly, pervaded the concert hall and came to rest with Tureck's characteristic mordent. The fugue was no less captivating with a clarion statement of the subject and the overwhelming tension of its subsequent stretti.

An effective baroque prototype of 19th century program music is to be found in the Capriccio on a Departing Brigid, which followed next on the program. Divided into six brief sketches, the work begins with friends gathering to dissuade the brother from departure. One hears their accumulated entreaties. They fugally picture the dangers which may befall him and then lament in F minor with chromatic longing. They say farewell with what could be termed resigned joy and the Postilion's aria is heard. The work closes with an exhilarating fugue in imitation of the Postilion's horn. Here was not only beautiful tone painting, but also an amazingly precise articulation and rhythmic drive which lifted the work out of the restrictions of the literal.

Madame Tureck knows how to get the best piano sound with discreet use of the pedal as evidenced by her 6th Partita in E minor. Particularly exquisite was the courante and the juxtaposition of two wonderful lines in the tempo di gavotta. Though the characteristic rhythm was necessarily lost in ornamentation, the sarabande was a powerful essay in intense tragedy. Where now are the complaints of static and mechanistic Bach.

After intermission, Madame Tureck delighted with three minuetts from the Anna Magdalena Notebook. Here was the essence of controlled two part playing.

The Italian Concerto ended the program. The vitality of the first movement, the depth of feeling of the second with its unbelievable pianissimo opening were marred only by slight inaccuracies and the almost unavoidable tendency to hurry in the presto. Two encores, the gigue from the B flat partita and the 29th Goldberg variation completed a performance which had those all too few sublime moments.

ritual, myth, atmosphere conveyed by St. Hilda's

On Monday evening a few (select few) of us had the unusual and exciting experience of witnessing a production of a drama in the Chinese tradition at St. Hilda's College. It was a highly daring and original venture of ST9 to present "The Willow Pattern", but fortunately one which came across with complete success. For the audience it was an evening of education delightfully coupled with first-class entertainment, an excellent introduction to Chinese drama.

The exact date of the first examples of Chinese drama is not known, but it is generally assumed that it dates back about twenty-three centuries. The classical form of the drama as we know it today originated from a combination of ritual ceremonies, dances, music, and religious and national superstitions. To the occidental mind, these elements often seem strange and unnatural and we find ourselves confronted by many highly stylized conventions, which never appear on the Western stage.

The themes or plot of the dramas, unlike the rather involved and elaborate stage effects are notable for their utter simplicity; themes such as ancestor worship, veneration of the dead, patriotism and filial devotion, usually constitute the subject matter of the plays. In presentation of these themes, we find there is no distinction between genres; comedy and tragedy appear together in a form which can be called nothing but melodrama. However the Chinese melodrama is pure and effective in its sincerity, and the action itself is heightened by the various attributes, that form such an important part of their drama.

The element of music is an age-old tradition in the Chinese theatre, and instruments such as gongs, cymbals, bamboo pipes, and moon guitars are used to increase the emotional impact of the action. Costumes must be lavish, and dazzle with their richness of colour and material, (fantastic sums of money are spent on their costumes, often completely out of proportion to other costs); the characters must glitter with jewels, and flashing swords.

The almost complete non-existence of any setting or scenic effects stands in strong contrast to the excesses and details we find in costuming and props. Here they rely entirely on the powers of suggestion, and on the imagination of the audience. Save for an odd screen or branch of a tree the stage is completely bare. It is often customary for the actors to describe the scene to the audience in the prologue, when they also introduce themselves.

This relationship between actors and audience is one of the outstanding and interesting characteristics of Chinese drama. Throughout the play we are constantly aware of the "rapport" between the characters and ourselves, which is usually established in the first few lines of the play.

Producing a play such as "The Willow Pattern", which was written in 1914 on the theme of the old Chinese traditional tale, is bound to present any company with a large number of problems; yet the production at St. Hilda's had cleverly overcome all these difficulties, and the result was a polished and highly successful performance.

Full credit should go to the director, Beverly Ross, who seemed to have mastered all the many conventions of the Chinese stage. The most noticeable of these being the highly stylized movement, which was sustained throughout by all the members of the cast. The hand movements and submissive nods of the head were skillfully executed, although the Chinese walk (or shuffle) did not come off quite so happily.

We were fascinated by the Property Man (Francis Newby), who continually shuffled on and off with the necessary props for each scene. There is never any curtain in Chinese drama, and the changing of scenes was very effectively carried out by the incense man (Vicki Atkinson), who paced the stage with poise and with a majestic step that showed the passing of time.

The ill-fated lovers were delightfully portrayed by Nancy Woods and Carline Jones; both had captured the restrained emotional expression that is so vital a part of the Oriental tradition. It was just this aspect that Patricia Pearson failed to grasp as the irate father; her loud outburst was somewhat out of context with the whole tone of the play, and was typical of the European style, which was so skillfully avoided by the other actors.

In accordance with the Chinese conventions, the use of music, properties and costuming were carried out most effectively. The gong announced each scene with a sinister ring, and the characters shimmered in their silken robes. All in all no stone was left unturned, every effect was used to perfection, including lighting and the subtly suggestive set, designed by Liza Wilson.

Indeed the production did more than justice to the play itself. It was a highly interesting insight into the traditions of Chinese drama.

Restrict Maritime Student Papers On Sex, Liquor, Late Leaves Etc

SACKVILLE, N.B. (CUP) — Maritime student papers recently concluded they are oppressed by their university administrations. The decision was reached at a recent Atlantic regional conference of the Canadian University Press.

A report appearing in The Argosy Weekly said most of the papers felt many restrictions as to content were placed upon them by university authorities.

One paper, the Acadia Athanaseum, said they had been told to stay away completely from sex, liquor, late leaves, and the Dining Hall.

Editor Donald Angus said a faculty member had told him to stop further comments on the dining hall because it was hurting the dietitian's feelings. The comments had appeared in a letter from a student, not in editorials in the paper.

The Xaverian Weekly complained restrictions were placed on pictures in the paper. All pictures showing girls must be approved by the dean of women.

The action was taken because one picture had been printed showing a girl, fully clothed, sitting on a piano.

University of New Brunswick's paper and the Dalhousie University paper said they had no restrictions placed on them. Mount Allison here must avoid giving the college a bad name.

Coach Welcomes 20 To Opening Workout

TWO STALWARTS and a veteran are among the headlines on this year's Intermediate hockey team. From left to right we have: Peter Warren, a defenseman; Terry Wensley, a flashy right winger; and Al Fleming; All-star goalie for three years with the Varsity Blues. Former Blue star Jack Wheldrake is coaching the squad which opens its schedule next Wednesday against McMaster.

Their big brothers gone a-hunting in Yankee country, the Varsity Intermediate pucksters look over the Arena last night.

With a game against McMaster University Marauders scheduled for next Wednesday, Dec. 10, the team will practice every night — except for Saturday and Sunday—between 5 and 6 p.m.

The team shall be called the intermediates for this season at least, until a more or less suitable name is drawn from a hat. The Whites, Blue-Jays, Baby Blues or what you may call them, have no league to operate in this year. However coach Jack Wheldrake predicts a full and varied season of play for his team.

Games with Ryerson, Waterloo, and Osgoode are pending.

East York Lyndhursts are probable opponents. A trip to Dundas Ont. to compete against the perennial Intermediate B powerhouse is expected. Several games with high school teams are being arranged, and will take place before Christmas.

Over twenty hopefuls donned their blades for last night's workout, only nine of whom are veterans of last season.

Although the large group keep coach Wheldrake on the go, he expressed hope for at least another fifteen good players. Jack would like to see more young players with desire to progress to the senior Blues in the next year or so.

With the varied experience gained with Intermediates, and under the watchful eyes of coach Wheldrake as well as Jack Kennedy, a player with desire and talent can't miss.

by john brooks

varsity sports editor

I don't understand why, but one of my closer cohorts in crime came trundling up in a mellow mood the other day, slapped me cheerfully at the bottom of the spine and, as I collapsed slowly in a sleepy heap on the floor, shattered the foggy morning atmosphere with:

"Well, you old b-----, (which I'm not), I hear you're getting married. That's great. I never thought old Baldy would summon up the courage to pop that question. Are you gonna get plastic surgery on your schnozz before the wedding? We'll have to have a great slag and invite . . ."

I groaned in my most agonizing voice and struggled to my feet, looking somewhat like a rusty television aerial that had just had channel 2 blown onto channel 6 with the most perpendicular of manoeuvres.

My voice, which I discovered after choking up a coffee spoon and half a rather bedraggled Export A, must have sounded like Foster Hewitt screaming "he shoots, he scores" with a hoarse gullet and a mouthful of sand.

"What?" That was my comment, complete with five question marks and a pain in my brain, as I racked it in search of my complete itinerary from the night before, realizing with a shiver of cold sweat that I had been writing an essay — alone and sober.

"Sure y'are. Lookit right here in The Varsity. Don't hand me any of that 'innocence' nonsense. It says right here that five Varsity staffers are getting married!" That cohort of mine sounded pretty convinced.

And I must admit that it was with a great deal of apprehension that I grasped the proffered sheet of newspaper (which my quivering fingers failed to hold and it floated gently to the floor).

The headline jumped out at me. "Marriage Strikes Varsity; Five Staffers To Wed." I knew then how my father felt when he tried to run out the door 23 years ago and Mom, who never threw a rope in her life, caught him with a perfect lasso-hold.

I reached for the paper (I didn't have to bend, because I continued to resemble channel 2 standing on its head on channel 6) gripped it with both hands, and put my nose to the page (my eyesight at 10 in the morning is not good).

(I remember now how odd it appeared to note that FIVE staffers were to wed. My vague knowledge of matrimony had always been based on the assumption that it takes two to tangle, and I can't divide two into five evenly for love nor money).

Remember racing frantically through exam results in the paper, hoping like Faith Charity herself your name was there? I did the same thing, and if my name had been there, I'd have needed all the Faith, Hope and Charity I could find.

I tried to straighten up to look my cohort clear in his cruel, grinning eyes, but my spine absolutely refused (at which point I had visions of becoming a hunchback without even a dame, let alone a wife).

Failing to overcome that physical obstacle, I firmly and fistedly thrust The Varsity into my cohort's ample breadbasket, and backed promptly into a wall, thereby protecting my vulnerable backside from collisions with wayward hooves approaching from the rear.

An hour later, slowly working my posture back to that advised by Charles Atlas and old army generals, I chucked to myself and flopped wearily into the old, red, arm-chair that sits like a padded Model-T in the corner of my room.

"Freedom," I sighed, "is so wonderful." I gazed happily around my modest abode, musing contentedly over the do-dads and bric-a-brac that were mine alone to have and to hold.

And it was then that my eyes came to rest on a picture — a rather pretty picture, and my confidence in avowed bachelorhood suddenly became very, very unsteady.

Unsteady objects soon fall, don't they?

Vic, OCE Advance In Girls BB Badminton Tournament Successful

By SHARON MILGRAM

Balls were bouncing and birdies were flying Wednesday evening as both the interfaculty basketball play-offs and the interfaculty badminton tournament got underway.

In the basketball quarter-finals, OCE and Vic Freshies defeated PHE I and POT Freshies respectively. The final scores which were indicative of just how closely matched the teams were are as follows; OCE 42-PHE I 39; Vic Freshies 38-POT Freshies 35.

In the first game the highly experienced OCE forward line was tied up considerably by a close checking PHE I guard line made up of Alayne Patterson, Judy Gray and Signy Paulson. Although the PHE I defence was quite good it did not seem to hamper OCE's Marilyn Parkinson who was the game's top scorer with 32 points. Other high scorers were Joy Mahood (18) and Barbara Black (10) of PHE and Nancy Flemming (9) of OCE.

The second game of the evening saw Vic Freshies take a 10-4 lead at the end of the first quarter and maintain their six point margin as the first half ended. Although the slightly favoured POT Freshie team led by Marg Anne White fought hard in the second half of the game, they were unable to defeat the Vic team.

High scorer in this game was J. Dustan of Vic who hooped 24 points. Other high scorers were N. Heaven (17) and B. Ray (10) of POT and L. Van Valkenburg (7) and H. Burns (6) of Vic.

On December 10 at 7 PM at

Hart House, OCE will meet Vic Freshies in one of the two semi-final games which will be played that evening. The other semi-final game which will be played at 8 p.m. will see PHE III battle it out with their "little sisters", PHE II.

The winners of these two games will compete for the basketball title in a final game which will be played on December 12 at 8 p.m. at Hart House. Preceding this final game will be a consolation game in which the losers of the semi-finals will participate.

Because of the very large turnout, it was impossible to pare the entries down to the magic number of sixteen girls who will begin to earn points for their faculties. As a result, matches will be held next week at the Drill Hall in order to eliminate the necessary number of girls. It is very important that the entrants arrive on time for their matches otherwise they will be eliminated by default.

Rugger Team To Play OAC On Saturday

Varsity Senior Rugger Blues and Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph, clash Saturday on the back campus in the All-Ontario intermediate rugger final for the Carling Cup.

The contest was originally scheduled for last Saturday at Varsity Stadium but postponed because of heavy snow.

Varsity, winners of the Ontario intermediate A league, easily won their semi-final 46-0 against an intermediate B club from Peterborough. Guelph, second in the A league, won their semi-final 3-0 against Balmly Beach.

The Aggies played the Blues once during the season's play and won 8-6 on their home field. The Blues, however, were without two of their regulars and are favoured to beat OAC in the final.

Varsity line up for a 1 p.m. kick-off:

Swimmers At Buffalo For Exhibition Meet

University of Toronto swim Blues face a heavy program this week-end, travelling to Buffalo tonight for an exhibition meet with Buffalo State, and sending several team members to Hamilton tomorrow for an international meet.

Blues bested the Buffalo crew, 76-10, last season here, and Coach Bill Yorzyk is confident of a repeat victory. Several of Varsity's better aquamen may not see action, with their coach resting them for events on Saturday.

The Ambitious City's international show is expected to attract some 800 swimmers from Eastern Canada and the United States. Preliminary events will be held in the afternoon, with final events carded for night.

Coach Yorzyk himself will compete in the meet, and his presence, along with that of McGill's Cameron Grout, Canada's top native swimmer, should place the record-books in severe danger.

Blues return home to take on Western Mustangs in an exhibition meet next Friday in Hart House. It will be a preview of things to come in the Intercollegiate finals in February.

Swimming for the Mustangs will be the Intercollegiate freestyle champion Larry Freeman, who starred in a Varsity suit last year and transferred to Western after academic difficulties.

Freeman will be unable to compete in the Intercollegiate meet, but plans to swim in the exhibition test next Friday.

Cage Blues Entertain West End Y Tonight

Johnny McManus' University of Toronto basketball Blues, preparing to take off on a couple of jaunts south of the border and some Florida sunshine, host West End Y Seniors in an exhibition game in Hart House tonight.

Included in the visitors' lineup is a face very familiar to Varsity fans — George Stulac, a versatile athlete who played a major part in Blues' trek to the Intercollegiate championship last season.

And just to make it a family affair, West End Y are coached by George's elder brother John, while kid brother Joe will don number 32 in a Varsity uniform.

In a preliminary game at 7 o'clock, (the senior tilt gets underway at 8.30), Don Lipke's Baby Blues entertain West End Y Juniors. Coach Lipke, under doctor's orders to restrict his actual playing to league games, will handle the Intermediates during exhibition tilts.

Coach McManus pared his team to 13 players after Tuesday's loss to Andy's Athletic Club, with Lou Probst, Paul Green and Bill McKeechne dropping to the Intermediates.

McManus must pare three more players from the Blues' roster before the team leaves next week on the first lap of a double-barrelled tour south of the border.

WUS Drive Desperate Extend Deadline Again

World University Service officials announced a second extension of the Share campaign deadline in a "last ditch stand" to try to reach a $10,000 objective. WUS co-chairman Sue Evans asked for "as much as possible, if you can't afford a dollar" last night while extending the campaign deadline to Friday.

Original deadline of Nov. 28 was extended last week to Dec. 10. Present deadline of Dec. 14 is final, Miss Evans said.

Last night's grand total of $1,699 included a $300 donation from staff members. By percentage, Nursing headed the score board with 80 percent of objective, followed by Trinity College with 42 percent.

All faculty and college representatives are asked to declare returns in the Students' Administrative Council office, especially the seven faculties who have made no returns to date, Miss Evans said.

Trinity Student

Rhodes Named

A Trinity College student has been awarded one of Ontario's two annual Rhodes Scholarships.

Steve Clarkson, IV Trinity, last night said he was "overwhelmed" at winning the scholarship that entitles him to two or three years study for a BA degree at Oxford.

Clarkson will take a course in Philosophy, Politics, and Economics while at Oxford. He intends to leave for England at the end of the school term. Requirements for the Rhodes Scholarship include both academic and extra-curricular accomplishments. Clarkson won the Maurice Cody Scholarship last fall and has been a consistent honour student taking modern history, French and Russian.

He was captain of the Trinity championship soccer team and is president of the Historical Club. He has been president of the French Club and has served on the Hart House Debates Committee and House Committee.

An active member of the UNTD, he is a sub-lieutenant in the Royal Canadian Naval Reserves.

"My career lies either in external affairs or in academia," he said.

Also awarded a Rhodes Scholarship was Desmond Paul Morton, a History student at Royal Military College, Kingston.

Ready Model Parliament Hold Elections Next Week All Parties "Prepared"

A scheduling conflict in the Ontario Legislature has forced the U of T Model Parliament committee to change its election plans.

The model parliament elections, usually held at the beginning of January will take place Dec. 17 this year, Model Parliament chairman Sue Davis said last night.

Reason for the change is the early opening for the next session of the Ontario legislature. The Model Parliament usually sits in the third week of January in the Ontario legislative chambers, but this year it may have to meet earlier to make room for the real parliament.

Election will be held before Christmas so the Model Parliament will be able to sit in session as soon as necessary after the holidays, Miss Davis said.

The parties will begin campaigning today, she said, and will continue till election day.

Progressive Conservative club president Gordon Ross said he was disappointed with the early election.

"I don't see how we can have a good campaign," he said.

Representatives of the other two parties in the model parliament were less disappointed.

"We've had study groups at work on political problems since our club elections," said Liberal parliamentary leader Phil Goulston, "and we welcome the election at this time."

Goulston said there was a shift of public opinion to the Liberal party.

"Our chances have been enhanced by Lester Pearson's recent speech in the United States, and by government inactivity."

The CCF is also prepared for the election. "Our campaign began with our annual convention last week when policy was hammered out and a leader elected," CCF parliamentary leader Hugh Peacock said.

"We have been winning the support of many politically uncommitted students who are impatient with the old parties. We are meeting these people on the basis of equality and mutual understanding as far as principle and participation in the model parliament are concerned," he said.

The Conservatives formed the government in last year's model assembly.

Lockhart Resigns

WINNIPEG — CUP — Dr. W. C. Lockhart, the principal of United College who has been under constant criticism since his firing of Prof. Harry Crowe in September has announced he will quit his post.

Making public his intention yesterday, Dr. Lockhart revealed the college had offered to reinstate Prof. Crowe. He said Prof. Crowe had been offered a chance to return to the college by the Board of Regents.

Since Dr. Lockhart's firing of Prof. Crowe on the strength of a personal letter from Crowe to a friend which was put in his hands, more than one-third of the college's teaching staff has quit in protest.

In his statement yesterday, Dr. Lockhart said:

"The attacks upon me have been vicious and persistent. They have come from a small group within my own faculty, from the University of Manitoba, from the Canadian Association of University Teachers and from the public at large.

"As a result of these, my position has become untenable and I have tendered my resignation.

"In my own defence I would like to make a few simple facts clear:

"I never at any time tampered with the mails. The letter in question came to me in Her Majesty's mail as an enclosure in an envelope addressed to myself. The letter was devoid of its original envelope.

"I could not avoid reading the pertinent sections of the letter. When I opened the envelope addressed to myself, Prof. Crowe's letter lay open before me on my desk.

"I did not know at first to whom it had been addressed or from whom it had come. It began 'Dear Viljo.' This was an unfamiliar name.

"But I did know that it had been in the hands of someone else. The accompanying note said, 'We think you should read it.' I did not know the 'we' referred—one person or 20 persons.

"The letter, by the time it reached me, was not, in my judgment, a privileged or private document. Others had been in possession of it and might also have already made use of it," he wrote.

Under the circumstances, Dr. Lockhart continued, he felt "morally bound" to keep a copy of the letter.

"If this was a mistake in judgment, I sincerely admit it," he said. "But I had no malicious intent. This should be clear from the fact that I was open and honest in informing Prof. Packer that I knew its contents and had retained a copy of it."

Dr. Lockhart concluded that he wrote to Prof. Crowe asking for an explanation of the views he expressed in the letter. Prof. Crowe, however, sent his lawyers, thus starting what Dr. Lockhart termed "this regrettable affair."

REDUCED HOLIDAY RATES

The Canadian Passenger Association has announced that reduced fare arrangements have now been authorized for the Christmas and New Year vacation period. Students and members of the teaching staff may obtain at College and Faculty Offices forms which will permit them to buy a return ticket at current normal one-way fare and one half.

These forms carry the dates of the University vacation period, December 19th, 1958 to January 5th, 1959, and no member of the University staff has any authority to alter these dates.

Vic Heads In 'Nensis

As order-taking for the U of T's all-campus yearbook enters its last day at reduced price of $4, sales have pushed above the $60 mark, 'Nensis sales manager Carole Levine said Thursday.

Leading the rush to order copies of the yearbook, Miss Levine said, is Victoria College. "They've been going hog-wild." The books are also selling well at Trinity and St. Michael's Colleges, she said.

The autograph sheet in the yearbook still has room for more signatures, she said. Students with 'Nensis sales receipts may sign the sheet, which will be printed in the book, after noon today in the 'Nensis office in the basement of the Students' Administrative Council building.

The book will contain "lots of pictures", Miss Levine said. She stressed the contents of the yearbook is aimed at all students, including freshmen.

HAMILTON (CUP) — Ontario Agricultural College students will have to pay for a prank supposedly pulled off by one of their fellows.

Last week officials at McMaster University discovered the university's atomic reactor — the first in Canada — had been covered with paint. Large letters "OAC" had been painted on by pranksters.

The OAC student council voted to pay the cost of re-painting the reactor. The move came in the interests of eliminating "inter-college rivalry which could manifest itself as potentially dangerous activities," one university official said.

The value of exchange weekends between universities cannot be overstated. Although sometimes such exchanges tend to become mere social free-for-alls, even social free-for-alls have their positive elements.

The University of Toronto already has one exchange, the Carabin weekend, which achieves a healthy balance of the social with the intellectual and embodies all that is excellent in the idea itself.

It should have another.

The Students' Administrative Council weekends committee is considering such a possibility and has sent out tentative feelers to several American universities.

The committee thinks that, with one Quebec exchange in operation, an American exchange would have much more purpose.

We agree with the committee and endorse the idea wholeheartedly.

It would be a pity, therefore, if the proposal flounders, as it is in danger of doing, because of the high financial cost involved.

The SAC is by no means a rich organization. Although it offers expansive services to Toronto students, there is seldom enough cash left over to entertain external relations on anything but a meagre scale.

In terms of hospitality we are one of the poorest students' councils in Canada. While the University of British Columbia can open its doors to six foreign students for World University Service, we can barely manage one—and then only through the efforts of the Engineering Society.

While McGill University can float a $5,000 national seminar each year, we have difficulty mounting an inter-university debate.

The fault is hardly that of the SAC. It is making ends meet with one of the lowest per capita student budgets in the country.

Other students' councils collect eight, ten, and sometimes fifteen dollars from each student. Toronto students only pay five dollars.

Last year the SAC asked the administration for a fee increase to eight dollars. It drew up an elaborate budget showing where the money would go and presented it to Simcoe Hall. The budget never even got as far as the Board of Governors.

Administration authorities felt the proposed increase did not provide enough tangible benefits to justify the increase.

The SAC is operating this year on a deficit budget and depleting reserves built up for capital expansion. Rather than expanding its services with increasing enrolment, it has had to cut back. Five years ago there were 100 Varsities a year. This year there will only be 82.

While we appreciate the fact that administration authorities hardly consider The Varsity to be a "tangible" benefit, we do however feel that exchange weekends, while not exactly "tangible", are of immeasurable benefit to students.

Even if the largest university in the country cannot sponsor more than one WUS student and finds the idea of a national seminar a fantasy to be realized by more lavish imaginations, it should still be able to rattle through enough small change to sponsor a three-day weekend for 40 Americans.

Our Readers Write:

Pay-by-the-Point

Dear Sir:

Although I am inclined to agree with Dr. Bissell's plan for financial aid for university students, I do so only as far as the principles are concerned. Let me clarify. I agree that financial aid should be available to deserving students. As to the method of distributing the aid, I am completely opposed to it.

Dr. Bissell's plan does not entice equality of opportunity, but rather, it tends to encourage the formation and nourishment of an "Intellectual Elite."

I have what I believe is a fairer and better plan.

The admission requirement for university in Ontario is an average of 60 per cent in the grade 13 annual examinations. Bursaries and financial help could be given on a percentage basis. Let us suppose that it was decided to award $15 per percentage point above 60. A student attaining 70 per cent in his exams would be awarded $150 applicable only to the payment of fees. Similarly, a person attaining 90 per cent would be awarded $450. By this method scholastic proficiency would be rewarded according to merit. Furthermore, if financial position was to be taken into account—perhaps by a means test—awards could be regulated according to the financial position of the student concerned. Out of town students could be given further assistance in view of their greater expenses.

In order to regulate the awards during the undergraduate years, I would recommend the abolition of our present system of marks. Let us have our percentages, not our classification. An "A" can mean 75 per cent or 95. Surely the student attaining 95 deserves more recognition and aid than the one with 75 per cent!

Finally, in justifying my plan, I would suggest that it creates equality of opportunity without detracting from the better students the financial aid which they so justly deserve. The third class students would not be left "out in the cold." Also, I would like to say that in choosing $15 as the standard, I did so purely for illustrative considerations. Someone with much more experience could arrive at a just amount.

Elite Institutions

Dear Sir:

I am very happy to see the flood of entertaining letters on Dr. Bissell's proposals for university education. Perhaps I may be allowed to add one more.

Almost everyone appears to be violently against the implications of the whole plan or some feature of it. If these are objectionable, however, one must surely offer alternatives instead of mere sweeping condemnations (such as "the damn thing ain't gonna work").

It must be realized that payment of free tuition for first class honour students, at first glance, seems to involve greatly increased costs to both university and government. But if one considers the large reduction which would result in the size of the university (someone said 50 per cent), if third class honour students are for all practical purposes, excluded, these increased costs may be almost offset. There is no doubt that the majority of third class honour students would be excluded if the vacation earning period is cut down and split up. If President Bissell also wishes to triple the fees, as is rumoured, this would be a complete certainty.

The principle of free tuition for superior students is applauded, but the principle of exclusion of mediocre students is condemned. Someone has mentioned that all citizens have a "right" — "the opportunity to benefit from higher education." In applying Dr. Bissell's plan, apparently, this right must not be infringed, but the standards of education must also be raised, which seems to be the purpose of the plan. Furthermore, this must be done, as shown above, without increasing present costs by an unreasonable amount.

Limiting university education to first and possibly second class honour students would produce a "cultural elite" of high quality but of very low quantity—insufficient, in fact, to supply the needs of the country.

Rather than decrease this supply of educated material unduly, it may be preferable to maintain the University of Toronto under the present system, and have other, perhaps smaller universities like the proposed York College organized on Dr. Bissell's basis of free tuition for first class honour students, and also exclude completely third class honour students from them. This may result in some Canadian universities of very high educational standards, like the Sorbonne and Oxford. Of course, it would also result in all first class honour students going to these "free" universities, and all third class students going to the others like the University of Toronto. This, unfortunately, can't be helped.

Unbeat Canadians

Dear Sir:

With regard to the article in Nov. 28th's paper entitled "Beat Canadians", I should like to present the other side of the story at S.M.C.—the organizations in which Canadians are active, and which seems to have been ignored in the article.

In both men's and women's athletics the Canadians hold their own. They exceed their American counterparts in participation in hockey and lacrosse.

The Music Guild is headed by a Canadian. The French Club executive is solely Canadian. Both organizations are actively participated in by the Canadians as well as Americans.

"Middies", the S.M.C. musical is Canadian written, produced and directed. Canadians take the majority of the lead roles. The turnout of Canadians for auditions equally matched if not exceeded the American number.

It is understandable why Americans are usually first year reps. The Canadian candidate has had a few weeks to orientate himself toward College life. The American has had a year and a few weeks and has already formed a permanent group of friends.

The article, by limiting itself to a very few organizations at S.M.C. has presented an unjust and biased view of activities at this College.

PEGGY EGAN, III S.M.C.

Ragged Soup Lines

They stand in long, straggling lines, clumsily garbed, rubbing tingling hands, tired from the long trek in the broken, biting winds that whistle with mocking cheer.

They are mute, most of them. Some rebel, cracking the silence with stoic grunts of human impatience. They shuffle slowly forward. Their brethren press pathetically from behind.

Two at a time, they file past, two at a time; machine-like, hollow, empty faces reflecting empty stomachs feeding cramped minds.

They grab their food lustily; weak, unnutritious food, and shamble out into the great austere room now packed with hundreds of faces just like their own, thinking hundreds of thoughts on the same inexorable theme, filling hundreds of hasty mouths with the same automatic urgency.

They fill the room, spill out of it, drip in regular columns of seated hounds on hard benches pressed close to the wall of echoing corridors.

Two or three hundred throats gurgle syrupy coffee, swallow unchewed lumps of flour and ham, hundreds of hands crinkle brown greasy bags and wipe coarse cotton trousers, hundreds of noses belch streams of tarred smoke and hundreds of feet shuffle slowly out into the wind again.

The cycle is complete. They leave as the new shift, the second seating, files in with the same monotonous necessity.

Look, you humanitarians, look long and well.

For these are the Gods of the future, the supermen of the generation you like to think is yours.

Look, for these are the men who control your destiny—these Engineers grabbing lunch in the Arbor Room.

An article on The West Indies by Prof. A. J. Earp which appeared in last Friday's Varsity was severely edited. Lorca's poetry on stage

A poet must be a professor of the five bodily senses . . . To command the most perfect images, he must open doors of communication between all of the senses . . . The metaphor links two antagonistic worlds through an equestrian leap of the imagination . . .

Federico Garcia Lorca, one of Spain's most powerful modern poets, wrote these lines shortly before his death in 1936. His Yerma, which he called "a dramatic poem in three acts and six scenes," is a high-water mark of his success in achieving his own striking kind of integration of lyric poetry with drama. In it Lorca turns to a theme present in much of his lyric and dramatic work, that of a frustrated longing for motherhood.

Yerma, a young Spanish peasant woman, passionately desires to have a child, but although she has been married for three years, she has not become pregnant. The tragic conflict (tragic because Yerma treats it so) is focussed sharply in Yerma's mind; its cancerous effect upon her is illustrated in a few carefully chosen and connected incidents. We see her with her husband whom she cannot understand, with other village women whose fecundity she envies, with her girlhood sweetheart who still fascinates her very soul. The play ends with a frenzied scene of fertility ritual, in which Yerma has placed her last weak hope. But when she learns unequivocally that her husband will never give her a child, beyond herself, she strangles him, crying "I myself have killed my son!" This climactic scene, implying as it does Yerma's own spiritual death, is one of great irony and pathos: never will she have the child for which she has longed.

In a poetic image which breathes life into mental quantities by equating them with natural ones, Lorca manages at the same time to catch up a suggestive, mystical quality. The protagonist's name—"barren"—illustrates the symbolic manner in which Lorca liked to work. His image is sensuous, and arrestingly visual: "Alas for her whose breasts are sand!" " . . . a mouth like a withered flower." "My child is a dove of fire he made slip in through my ear." Always it springs from a "leap of the imagination", yet is accentuated against a norm of verse that is almost stark in its simplicity.

Any non-Spanish production of Yerma begins with a deck stacked against it; the existing English translation fails to carry the play's action: the effect linguistically is pathetic. Purposeless colloquialisms mingling with a diction that is occasionally crassly sophisticated, made even uglier by an obvious jingling rhyme in some places: such defects falsify the simple beauty of Lorca's poetry.

A poet chooses words for their appearance, their sound, their associations, their relation with other words similarly chosen. A good translation can only hope to approximate the denotative meaning of the original, and rarely to be able to transpose, for instance, a Spanish scene into its closest English equivalent. Yerma might translate best into the Irish idiom, comparable perhaps to something of Synge. Such speculation is meaningless, however: no poetry can be translated properly, and Lorca's lends itself extremely badly.

The University Alumnae Dramatic Club is offering Yerma to its (involuntarily) select audiences at the Coach House, 200 Bedford Road, this week. It will be interesting to see them do the play in the drama festival on a bigger stage, where there will be more than spitting distance between actor and spectator. Frances Holpenny is to be congratulated for attempting such a production; it is somewhat of a disappointment, but a very interesting one.

A director's main problem is, of course, to find a Yerma. Elizabeth Mascall valiantly tackles a rôle in which she is sadly miscast. She seems unable to convey the essential soft quality which must communicate Yerma's tragic longing to an audience and win sympathy for it.

Similarly, Martin Hunter is too wooden and whiney a Juan; one can scarcely believe from the way he says his lines that his honour really means anything to him. Victor is ably played by Powell Jones. It is a pity that the full poignancy and beauty of his scenes with Yerma were lost.

The whole cast should realize that it does not have to yell; Coach House audiences are uniquely privileged in being able to hear everything. By the same token, actors in such a small house must under-play. Stagey mannerisms and other evidence of ignorance of stage business have no place.

The Alumnae's pacing is very slow. Perhaps as the performers gain confidence their dialogue will achieve the lightness and rapidity that is essential to the play. When every scene is given the heavy emphasis of a sledge-hammer climactic moments have nothing from which to rise.

As Maria, Judith Teague achieves the most polished and sympathetic performance of the evening. Her artistic elation admirably does justice to the music of her lines. May she be an example to the majority of the cast, whose "cultured" Torontonian jars in the mouths of peasant folk.

Lighting effects are sensitive, blending well with the simple and extremely effective backdrop of draped curtain. Most appropriate were the clever variations of this curtain to signify change of location.

As in Shakespeare, so in Lorca, songs and guitar music serve a choric function, stressing subtleties of theme and mood. In this production the lyrics were very well handled indeed, and did establish, along with intermittent guitar strains, the very necessary Spanish context of the play.

Law & Disorder

A bright little farce at the International called Law and Disorder (which sounds as though it was made by the Boulting brothers, but wasn't), is a good test of two old rules of thumb for farces: keep your plot down to one main action, and don't let the audience stop to think about it. Law and Disorder contains not one, but three sections: an introduction; a wildly exciting central action, and a conclusion that can't really get away from being an epilogue. In the first and last sections there is a bit too much time for us to think.

We meet Percy Brand (Michael Redgrave) as he is leaving prison, in 1938, 1941 and 1946, in each case having been convicted of confidence swindling, and sentenced each time by the same imposing figure, Sir Edward Crichton (Robert Morley). Percy is beloved by all his underworld friends, and by his son Colin (Jeremy Burnham), who thinks his father is an Anglican missionary back from overseas. The atmosphere is charming and arch, but the pace is just slow enough that we have time to notice, for example, that the cars parked outside the prison in '38, '41 and '46 are all newer than those years.

The film picks up from here on. Colin, who has been called into the bar, has become Judge Crichton's marshal, assisting him at all trials. Percy decides it is time to retire from crime, and goes to live at a quiet seaside town. No sooner does he begin to make friends at the local pub when an old confidence pal, Major Proudfoot (Lionel Jeffries), arrives on the scene with a magnificent idea for robbing a crooked London jeweller, having spread a rumour that a large collection of stolen emeralds are to be smuggled into England, he has arranged to sell them at a good price to the jeweller. But a scene must be created at customs, and a chase staged, so that the jeweller will have to pay for their sight unseen and drive away quickly. Our heroes will get the money, and the jeweller will get a nice box of chocolates.

The ingenious preparations for this fraud, and the madcap chase that results when it doesn't quite go off as planned, are as comical as they are exciting. The whole central section is tightly edited, a wonderfully sustained farce.

However, out of this develops an end plot in which Percy's friends try to delay a trial under Judge Crichton, so that Colin won't find out his father is a professional swindler. This involves first, a trumped-up court case about a parrot, and then an attempt to frame the judge himself of smuggling. It is here that we begin to notice the pace lagging once more, and it gives us time to think of some of the absurdities of the whole thing. Bu Michael Redgrave and Robert Morley are consistently entertaining, as the proponents of disorder and law respectively, and Lionel Jeffries as Major Proudfoot has a wonderful, oily, raffish charm.

Burf Kay

oxygenated vivaldi

Last Saturday night we witnessed a concert by Hart House Orchestra playing an all Vivaldi program. The orchestra was led by its conductor Boyd Neel and the guest soloist was flutist Nicolas Fiore.

The program opened with the Concerto Grosso in A-minor. It was done rather well technically, but it lacked in spirit. The Concerto for Flute and Strings in D followed. The orchestra again played adequately and Mr. Fiore played the difficult passages with comparative ease. This is not one of Vivaldi's most successful works and therefore, was nothing more than pleasing. Next we heard the Concerto for four Violins and Strings in B-minor. Here we found Vivaldi in experimental mood. For example in the second movement he tried to make each violin an individual by giving each different texture which produced a rather interesting sound.

During the intermission little did we dream that in the next half-hour we would undergo our most thrilling experience in a long time. But such was the case. As the program continued we became elated by the magic sound of Vivaldi's music.

After the intermission we heard the Concerto for Piccolo and Strings with Mr. Fiore again as the soloist. This concerto, is unlike the other concert of the period, in that the solo instrument is treated in a virtuosic manner. Mr. Fiore rose to the occasion most remarkably. Running passages, ornaments, trills, poured out of the little piece of wood, while everybody gasped for breath in amazement. Everybody, that is, except Mr. Fiore who had no time for such trivialities. His rare breathing led us to wonder how he managed to stay alive. So we played a detective, and as Mr. Fiore made his exit from the hall we "accidentally" bumped into him going into his inside pockets. . . . No, he did not have an oxygen bottle with him.

The program ended with the Concerto for Strings and Cembalo in G, also known as "alla Rustica". The work is a little gem in itself and was played excellently by the orchestra. It has two vigorous movements, one in unusual 9/8 meter and the other in 2/4, and between these a short and chordal largo was squeezed.

Boyd Neel led the orchestra with his usual firm hand. Perhaps the most interesting feature of his interpretation of this Baroque composer was the liberal use of crescendo.

All in all the concert was a success. We heard some exciting solo playing by Mr. Fiore, we heard some good group-playing by the Hart House Orchestra, and we heard the concert in the Great Hall of Hart House which is just about the best place for concerts of this type in Toronto, because of its air of intimacy and antiquity.

BLUES VICTORS IN PENALTIES

Brawl Erupts In Colorado Game; Hockey-wise, Varsity Still Winless

SPECIAL TO THE VARSITY

COLORADO SPRINGS, COL. — Special — Remaining true to the form of previous years, Varsity hockey Blues continued their winless ways in games here. Absorbing an 8-2 drubbing at the hands of Denver University Pioneers Friday night, Blues went on to a 5-3 loss to Colorado College Tigers on Saturday.

On Friday night, Bill Kennedy's unassisted goal held Denver to a 1-1 tie in the first frame. Pioneers blasted home two goals in the second period, and five more in the third before a solo effort by Dunc Brodie finally garnered another goal for Varsity.

Blues managed eight minor penalties, and misconducts to John Macdonald and Lorry Stacey, to Denver's six minors and a misconduct.

Blues' goalie Ray Dunn absorbed 48 shots while Denver's Rodney Schneek had 28.

Forward Bill Masterton lead Pioneers' scoring attack with two goals and two assists. Defenceman Wayne Klinck garnered a goal and two assists.

Blues' play was never up to par while Denver can readily boast a real power-house.

In what turned out to be a battle for a seat in the sin-bin, Colorado College Tigers outscored Varsity 5-3 in the exhibition tilt Saturday.

Although Blues managed four penalties to the Tigers' two, the first period saw no goals scored.

Colorado outscored Blues, 2-1, in the second stanza, Dunc Brodie sinking the lone Varsity tally on an assist from Howie Roth. Blues, however were not outdone in the penalty parade, receiving the nod four times to Tigers' two. Macdonald was awarded his second misconduct of the series.

Harry Neale opened the scoring in the third frame with an unassisted goal. Brodie closed out the period with a goal on an assist from Dave Stephen. Colorado sandwiched three goals in between these, however, to clinch the contest.

The game ended in a slug-fest. Again Blues took top honors in the penalty parade, serving three minors, two majors, and three match penalties. Colorado suffered two minors and a major.

Grant Mills received a match penalty, while Stacey and Stephen were awarded match penalties plus majors for indulging in the fine art of fisticuffs.

Although Varsity played a much-improved brand of hockey, and two of the Tiger goals were disputed, and rather doubtful tallies, matters don't seem to be improving for Blues. Varsity defence star Ron Casey, sat out the second game with a knee injury.

Colorado aimed 41 shots at Bob Giroux in the Varsity nets, while Blues retaliated with only 21.

Blues will play one more game with each club before returning home to face University of Montreal Carabins here this Friday.

Aquamen Win 67-21 Over Buffalo Staters

Special to The Varsity

BUFFALO, N.Y., Dec. 6 — University of Toronto swimming Blues, using their second-string competitors frequently, whipped Buffalo State, 67-21, in an inter-collegiate exhibition meet here last night.

Blues had little difficulty overcoming the hosts, whom they belted, 76-10, in Toronto last season.

Coach Bill Yorzyk swam in two events himself — winning both — while Dave Harvey, Bill Sims and Joe MacInnis were other standouts for the visiting Toronto crew.

Yorzyk captured the 220-yard freestyle and the 200-yard butterfly, winning the first in 2:12.0 minutes, and covering the latter distance in 2:09.0 minutes.

MacInnis won the 100-yard freestyle, and swam on Varsity's winning 400-yard medley relay team. MacInnis was trailed by Blues' George Ashenhurst in the 100-yard event.

Bob Fisher, Alex Chiu and George Milne joined MacInnis in the medley event, which Toronto topped with a winning time of 4:23.1.

Team captain John Ridpath finished the 200-yard backstroke in 2:17.9, trailed by team-mate Nick Thierry. Blues' Mike Stipetic took first spot in the 400-yard freestyle, followed by Varsity's Ernie Wilson. Time was 5:17.1.

Chiu won the 200-yard breaststroke in 2:36.9, Toronto finished on a winning note by taking the 400-yard medley relay in ample time. Kit Moore, Sims, Milne and Thierry made up the Varsity quartet that crossed the line in 4:13.0 minutes.

HAMILTON, Ont., Dec. 7 — University of Toronto swim coach Bill Yorzyk won the 100-yard butterfly, and Varsity freshman swimmer John Deacon came within a split-second of upsetting the American national breast-stroke champion in the annual Winter Carnival here yesterday.

Yorzyk won the butterfly event with ease, while Deacon was only one-tenth of a second behind Kurt Rumpel, the US national champion in the breast-stroke event. Deacon whipped Canadian titlist Bill Vanderpol of Hamilton.

Blues captured the unofficial team title for senior men, and had two competitors in each of the 100-yard freestyle and 100-yard breast-stroke final.

A total of 543 competitors from all parts of Canada and the United States were present at the meet. Preliminaries were held in the afternoon, with finals at night.

Rinkies Host To Mac Hockeymen

Varsity Intermediate hockeyists face off against McMaster University Marauders for their first game of the season. The game scheduled for tomorrow afternoon in Varsity Arena will start at 4 o'clock.

McMaster are an unknown power this season, having had little opportunity to strut their stuff.

Intermediates have a formidable array of talent in tow. Nine returnees from last year's club form the backbone of Jack Wheldrake's ice unit.

In goal, veteran Al Fleming, stellar netminder with the Blues for many years, has rejected retirement, and will see action.

Paul Gawinski, with the Blues way back in 1951, has returned to the fray.

Gord Gow, Pete Warren, Bruce Doidge, and Paul Finlay are joining the squad fresh from workouts with the "big" team.

Morgan Dever of Blues' football fame, has turned his talents to hockey.

Terry Wensley, last year's top scorer, will perform at right wing, while Don Northwick, captain of last year's squad, is expected to return to action.

Coach Wheldrake will dress 18 men for this exhibition tilt, and promises a good calibre of hockey from his boys.

St. Mike's Tie Up Boxla Final Play

St. Michael's College tied the intramural lacrosse final with a hard-fought, 19-10, win over University College yesterday. Individual star of the game was Double Blue's Curt Russell, who held high-scoring Bert Naylor in check while potting six goals himself.

Clark added five for the Irish, with Wheeler netting a similar number and O'Neil scoring a hat-trick. Naylor had five for Redmen, while Hill and Spence netted two each. Fraser added a singleton.

Third and deciding game will be played Wednesday at 1 p.m. Skule Sevenths whipped Skule Eighths 8-1, in hockey play, with Eskine netting three goals to pace the winners. Lindsay netted the lone losers' tally.

Chamberlain counted all four goals as Meds Fourths whipped Trinity D, 4-1. Sim scored the lone Black Panther marker.

Senior Skule A defeated Senior Skule B, 2-1 in squash play while UC Loudon took Pre-Med A, 15-9, 15-6 in volleyball.

West Enders Drop Cage Blues

By MIKE CHYKALIUQ Varsity Staff Reporter

At Hart House, Friday night, the Toronto West End Y seniors whipped the Senior Blues to the tune of 70-49. The John Stulac-coached quintet grabbed an early lead and never looked back.

They were ahead 35-21 at half-time. Varsity narrowed it to 48-44 in the second period but the drive failed to overcome the large lead. At this point, the smooth-working West Enders led by high scorers Lipka, Chesler, and Fawcett, promptly salted the game away with a barrage of points.

The Blues fought back but their marksmen were having an off-day. Consequently most of the shots rebounded harmlessly.

Aggressive play by George Stulac and Lipka was instrumental in retrieving most of these re- bounds for the West Enders.

Ruby Richman, once again, was Varsity's top scorer with 17 points. John Dachyshyn and Curt Russell were the only bright specks on the Blues' rebound horizon, which, to say the least, was slightly overcast on Friday night.

Toronto: Patterson 0, Joe Stulac 1, Potter 6, Mandel 4, Richman 17, Lipka 2, Goldring 0, Norman 0, Mencil 1, Russell 5, Maguire 6, Ecclestone 3, Dachyshyn 4, To- tal—49.

West End Y: Moch 3, Lipka 17, Armstrong 0, Geo. Stulac 11, Chesler 14, Fawcett 15, Risby 4, Ryan 0, Maynerick 6, Total—70.

silver scissors, red ribbon Bookstore Opened

By VICKIE INNES
Varsity Staff Reporter

The silver scissors flashed in the cold, December sun and the cleaved ends of red ribbon fluttered to the ground.

The official opening of the U of T Press Building had begun.

The ribbon cut, U of T President Claude T. Bissell stepped away from the small group of smiling gentlemen with their fur-wrapped wives and unlocked the door to the right of the main entrance.

The official ceremony was completed when he unlocked the centre door from the inside. From that moment, informality reigned.

Close to 500 guests were invited to the Saturday afternoon opening. Dr. Bissell, Dr. Roger Shugg, director of the University of Chicago Press and Mr. M. Jeanneret, U of T Press director, and their wives were guests of honor.

A tour of the new building had been marked out by arrows for the occasion. It included the Administration and Accounting offices on the second floor and the third-floor Editorial offices.

A cinder-block construction, possible choice for other new campus buildings, makes up the walls of the two upper storeys. Framed pictures of contributing authors to the Press, who include off-campus figures such as Sir Ernest MacMillan, lived up the predominantly pale color scheme of green, yellow and grey.

The one-year-old building, designed by Mathers and Haldenby, replaces the previous headquarters in Baldwin House on St. George St. The top storeys were completed and ready for use in July and the ground floor Bookstore in the Fall.

The building contains all Press requirements but the manufacturing departments and printing plant offices which remain in the original building.

Books from the Association of American University Presses were set up in a special display for the event. Another attraction causing some speculation was the table-sized model of the proposed U of T campus of 1968, planned to accommodate an anticipated enrollment of 26,000.

How to do without banks

(in millions of easy steps)

Step one: Simply carry with you all the money you need for immediate purpose . . . tuition, bills, incidental expenses, etc. This keeps your money at everybody's fingertips.

Step two: If you can't spend or lose your money immediately, press it under your mattress. This keeps it crisp and unspoiled . . . none of this mingling with other people's money in a bank earning savings account interest.

Steps three, four, five, six, seven, eight . . . ad infinitum: When you have bills to pay, pay them in person. Why spend 10c for a cheque that you can mail, when you can spend hours trudging around or riding buses or looking for a place to park?

Step Infinity-plus-one: If you have valuable or hard-to-replace papers around, buy a good, sturdy safe. It may cost $500 or so, but you'll save the $5.00 an inexpensive safety deposit box would cost.

P.S. If you don't care to master all these steps, drop in at your nearest BNS branch.

Students are always welcome.

Crowe Case Gathers Force 25 United Students Quit

WINNIPEG — CUP — Staff and students of United College and the University of Manitoba have become interplaying forces as the Harry Crowe case rages into one of the country's biggest academic furors ever.

Yesterday 25 United students announced they are leaving the college next month and have been accepted at the University of Manitoba for the remainder of the year.

Among them are almost all of the college's honor students and holders of 26 scholarships.

Yesterday afternoon 46 students marched on the provincial legislature building carrying placards protesting the dismissal. The march was timed to coincide with ceremonies celebrating the 10th anniversary of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights.

At the same time the United Church of Canada is going ahead with plans for a committee inquiry to be held next week at the call of Rt. Rev. Angus J. MacQueen, church moderator.

At the same time, 25 United College faculty members have supported the board of regents in its demand for a judicial inquiry into the case.

(Manitoba Premier Duff Roblin is on record as saying he will call an inquiry if both parties request it although his government "does not wish to intervene in a dispute between an individual and an educational institution under private auspices".) A 16th member of the college's teaching staff has announced her resignation. Marion Martin, French lecturer, yesterday informed the board of her decision, effective next year, in protest against the administration's handling of the case.

At the University of Manitoba, of which United College is an affiliate, 104 professors threw their support behind Prof. Crowe's refusal to accept the board of regent's recent reinstatement offer.

Declaring that terms for reinstatement laid down by the board were "such that Prof. Crowe could not have accepted", the professors indicated there might be more names forthcoming. The university has about 300 on the faculty.

Although one board member claimed the reconciliation offer was unconditional, Prof. Crowe said the board insisted he make public his letter, apologize publicly to United College Principal W. C. Lockhart and declare an oath of allegiance to the college.

A neutral stand by the University of Manitoba's students' union was violently opposed last week by The Manitoban, the university student paper.

In an editorial protest Dec. 3 the paper accused UMSU of "astounding timidity" and "an ostrich in the sand" attitude and urges all Manitoba students to object strongly at "this breach of academic freedom."

The council had previously refused to take a side in the matter because its members felt student interference would hinder attempts at settlement.

Study Radio Plan

The Students' Administrative Council is waiting for further information before acting on a request to help form a national student broadcasting agency.

The request came in the form of a motion forwarded from Newfoundland's Memorial University students' council to form an Association of University Radio Broadcasters.

The Association would sponsor 30 hour-long national radio programs weekly throughout the year. Proposed format of the programs would include interviews, general information, entertainment (drama, live music etc.) and a national university news round-up.

U of T Pharmacy student John Dube, in charge of investigating the request, has written to the Memorial students' council asking for more information. "We are just in the preliminary stages", Dube said last night.

A letter to SAC from Memorial student David Warren accompanying the motion explained that Memorial has produced such a program on a provincial basis for three years.

The National Federation of Canadian University Students has promised its full support to the plan, Warren said.

The Memorial resolution said the proposed program would answer a "need for the establishment of a closer relationship between the university students of Canada and improvement of relations between students and the general public".

The motion proposed use of national facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for transmission of the weekly broadcast, although production and preparation would be left in the hands of the individual universities.

Warren made no mention of CBC approval of the plan.

At least 10 universities, one from each province, will be needed to start the national program, Warren said. Co-ordinating point would be CBC Toronto, he said.

Campus Politicos Start Moving As Election Date Gets Closer

With only a week left until the advanced Model Parliament elections Dec. 17, campaigning among the three campus political parties got going yesterday with a Progressive Conservative challenge, a CCF charge and a Liberal expression of confidence.

Conservative chief Jeremy Johnston challenged the CCF to debate its recently-announced foreign policy platform. The CCF platform includes Canadian withdrawal from all defence pacts such as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

CCF parliamentary leader Hugh Peacock said, "We will accept the conservative challenge and provide them with their one opportunity to get into the campaign." He charged the Conservatives do not intend to seriously contest the election because they are unable to form a cabinet that will agree on policy.

Liberal leader Dick Hamilton said the Liberal party platform will be released at a lecture by Ontario Liberal leader J. J. Wintermeyer today.

Mr. Wintermeyer will probably discuss Ontario Liquor laws, the Ontario hydro commission and education, campus Liberal publicity director Clare Lewis said last night.

The Conservative platform, released at an executive meeting yesterday, includes Senate reform, the ending of government monopolies and increased foreign aid. The CCF, Peacock said, is winning the support of many "politically uncommitted" students.

"Many non-CCF'ers are planning to sit for us in the Parliament," he said.

CCF president Gerry Caplan said he was surprised at the "audacity" shown by the Conservatives in making Senate reform part of the platform after Prime Minister John Diefenbaker promised Senate reform and has done nothing about it.

Liberal Clare Lewis said, "We are fully prepared for the election."

Share hopes —

With Share returns crowding the $3,000 mark, campaign chairman Sue Evans last night said she is "tremendously hopeful" that contributions will reach $5,000 by Friday night.

Faculty and college representatives told the Students' Administrative Council last night reaction to the Word University Service campaign is universally bad.

Engineering rep Robin Beamish reported Skule returns are so low the faculty will not be able to sponsor a foreign scholar unless the Engineering Society makes up the difference.

Staff returns are up $200 this year, and receipts from football parking revenue are up $300. Student donations are down over $1,000 from last year's total.

The campaign ends Friday afternoon.

News Snaps

Carol Sing Tonight

A popular Varsity Christmas tradition will be re-enacted tonight when students join in an all-campus carol sing.

Carolers will meet in front of Hart House at 7 p.m. and proceed to various campus residences until 9 when they will gather in the Great Hall for refreshments.

Unknown Raider . . .

The silence of Whitney Hall, University College Women's residence was shattered Monday night by the screams of an unknown male.

About midnight, the girls were awakened by shouts in the hall of second floor in Mutch House. A man, apparently a student, boldly walked by the night portress, and with her in pursuit, ran up two flights of stairs, and down the fire stairs.

He escaped by a fire door, setting off a fire alarm.

Modern Music Blasted

Professor Geoffrey Payzant, lecturer in Philosophy at U of T and editor of the Canadian Music Journal painted a gloomy picture of the future of music for the Philosophy Society last night.

In his lecture on Technological Alienation in the Arts with Special Reference to Music, Prof. Payzant condemned innovation in music. "Everyone is trying to be different from everyone else but in the same way," he said. "Mere innovation for the sake of a gimmick is a smokescreen for nothing. Composers like Shoenberg and Stravinsky have forsaken the end for the means."

Lockhart Familiar Here Five Years With SCM

Dr. W. C. Lockhart, vortex of the current whirlpool of principle at United College, was long connected with U of T.

Graduating from Victoria and Emmanuel Colleges in 1933, he served as general secretary to the U of T Student Christian Movement from 1935 to 1940.

Noted for his pacifist stand during the troubled pre-war years, he later modified his views and became chaplain for the COTC contingent here.

Dr. Lockhart did post-graduate work in Edinburgh, Scotland. Later he became secretary of the Canadian Committee of the World Council of Churches.

In 1939 he led the Canadian delegation at the World Christian Youth Conference in Amsterdam. As a student he was prominent as a rugby and hockey player and lived in Burwash Hall for seven years.

In 1940 Dr. Lockhart resigned his post with SCM to undertake the ministry of Sherbourne St. United Church.

Hart House Confused

Hart House Warden Joseph McCulley almost had a female guest at his Christmas dinner this year.

A letter addressed to "Bresima Mayne, Esq." was received by a Jamaican resident of Whitney Hall, University College women's residence, inviting her to the Warden's annual dinner for overseas students.

On being advised of their error, House officials said galley proofs of the new students' directory had been used as reference for invitations, and there is often no way of distinguishing the sex of foreign students.

"We do count on a certain amount of word-of-mouth publicity to cover just such an occurrence one official said. 'If it happens in only one case, then we consider ourselves lucky.'"

College Press Meet Suggests Nfcus Link

MONTREAL — CUP — A Quebec-Ontario conference of Canadian University Press met here Saturday and tossed a few of the organization's problems into the ring. Nobody had very many answers.

Prime purpose of the conference was to straighten out details of a new constitution for CUP. The constitution, which strengthens CUP's executive, will be presented at a national conference in Winnipeg this month.

The conference was held at Sir George Williams College. Delegates from Toronto, McMaster, Western, Carleton, Ottawa, McGill, University of Montreal, and Laval attended.

Andre L'Heureux, executive secretary for the National Federation of Canadian University Students, spoke to delegates of the possibility of CUP becoming affiliated with Nfcus.

He said affiliation would give CUP a central office in Ottawa and a permanent secretarial body.

The proposal was backed strongly by Quebec delegates, most of whom presented the new constitutional amendments at last year's conference.

Opposition came from The Varsity and the McGill Daily. These papers said they could see nothing to be gained from affiliation unless the CUP president could remain permanently in Ottawa.

A committee has been appointed to investigate the matter before the national conference meets.

The conference passed no other resolutions.

Tuition Scheme Gets Vic "No"

Victoria College's debating parliament turned thumbs down on proposals of President Bissell's committee on student aid Tuesday night.

The motion "This House Supports the U of T Education Program" was defeated by a 34-21 vote after a heated argument involving Vic President Dr. A. B. Moore, guest speaker.

Sue Evans (III Vic), the first speaker for the Government, quoted Disraeli as saying, "A university should be a place of light, liberty and learning". She said the new proposals, if effected, would greatly encourage specialized study and post-graduate research.

Clark Leith (IV Vic) headed the opposition attack by calling the report "the work of masters of deceit".

"The President's advisory committee creates unwanted, unneeded and additional problems", he said.

Second speaker for the government, Dave Silcox (III Vic), stressed the proposals would eliminate the student socialite and act as increased incentive for all students. "The plan will wake society out of its half-speed merry-go-round", he said.

Donna Youngblut (II Vic) seconded the opposition attack. Referring to the threat from Soviet education, she said, "Those who try and keep up with the Joneses never succeed."

She said students under the new plan would be working for profit motives and hence lose something of their essential freedom. "Big Brother will certainly be watching the student envisaged by the Ross-Bissell report", she added.

Guest speaker, Dr. A. B. Moore, supported the aims and principles behind the report, but disproved of some points regarding first and second-class students.

Dr. Moore said Canada is not reaping the full benefits of its talent. "Too many potential university students are not getting there because of financial incapability," he said.

SAC At A Glance

Besides agreeing that Sac At A Glance is "facetious", the Students' Administrative Council last night:

—giggled about references to married students,

—rose monotonously to wait about small Share campaign returns, —decided that modern students just were not interested in Charity,

—leapt at a solution by SAC vice-president Adrienne Poy that college and faculty drives be given a particular objective, —gave notice of amendments to the SAC constitution to be presented next term, —learned from chairman Jerry Case the motion of notice was "historic", —threw out motion by UC rep Marv Catzman that SAC members get free tickets to AVR "black-tie" opening, —heard Engineering rep Robin Beamish throw the weight of science behind proposal to sponsor an exhibition of Canadian painting, —blushed when Catzman told council to think about the Canadian Association of Medical Students and Internes' report on student income tax deductions while the subject was "fresh in our hot little minds", —roared when it learned Vic rep Sue Evan's injured leg had become "aggravated over the weekend", —sat mute, bloody and unbowed through a 20-minute "harangue" from president Vince Kelly about the value of good public relations for SAC, —exited from the charoer murmuring "I am just another SAC service" to itself, —wandered over to Trinity Dean A. J. Earp's apartment for refreshment and entertainment.

SAC takes CUSAC—

The Students' Administrative Council took over a Hart House function last night by creating a student art committee.

The committee will cooperate with the Canadian University Students' Art Committee in arranging exhibits on a national basis.

CUSAC requested transfer of Toronto's art committee to SAC this year because of Hart House's all-male character.

Committee chairman Murray Ross told SAC last night the committee might in future organize provincial or regional exhibits in addition to those sponsored through CUSAC.

Alumni Criticized

SASKATOON, (CUP) — University alumni associations came under fire in Seattle, Washington last week when alumni secretary for the University of Saskatchewan described them as "millstones around the necks of universities".

Addressing the American Alumni Council in Washington, Frank Lovell said university administrations are often misled into believing alumni have greater value than they actually have.

"Many of our universities would be better off if they did not have their alumni associations as they exist today", he said.

Administration - alumni relations, he said, often have to keep on with their "same dreary programs" because of alumni failure to try out new ideas.

Calling for greater communication between faculty and alumni he warned that "no university these days can afford to have an alumni association that does not offer a program of superior service".

the case of harry crowe

In September of this year, an unknown professor of history at a tiny college in Manitoba emerged from obscurity and shot with fantastic rapidity into national prominence.

The case of Professor Harry Crowe and his fight with United College, Winnipeg, has been widely celebrated in the press. Because he protested the invasion of his privacy, the tampering with of his personal correspondence with a colleague and lost his job in the ensuing scandal, Harry Crowe has been adorned with all the trappings of the persecuted man.

A special committee of the Canadian Association of University Teachers investigated the matter and declared in a voluminous report that Harry Crowe was a "victim of injustice."

But, as the movement gathered force across the country, as students protested at the college and staff members began handing in their resignations, the picture was undergoing a rapid change.

Now the roles of persecutor and persecuted were being reversed. As the full weight of local support and of the press lined up behind Crowe, a heavier weight of condemnation descended on Dr. W. C. Lockhart, the college principal into whose hands Crowe's controversial letter had come.

Now Lockhart, originally the villain, was pushed into a corner, hounded, and at length forced into resignation.

In the great mass of fact and conjecture that surrounds the case, two matters of first importance remain unknown.

What, first of all, did Crowe say in the letter that fell into Lockhart's hands; and who, in the second place intercepted Crowe's letter and readdressed it to Lockhart.

We can guess with fair certainty, that the letter contained strong criticism of the college. Similarly, it is safe to guess that in the college where ideologies conflict between academic staff and administration, the letter-theft was the work of an enemy of Crowe.

Under such circumstances, it is pointless to try to pin the blame on an individual. When Dr. Lockhart found before him a letter of criticism he was virtually incapable of avoiding, the fact that he communicated with Crowe and requested an explanation cannot be considered unreasonable.

Crowe, on the other hand, made certain assumptions. In Kingston, Ont., at the time, he did not reply to the letter but put the matter in the hands of his lawyers.

In the muddle that followed, the Board of Regents, whose servant Lockhart was, saw fit to dismiss the professor whose criticisms they had felt before.

Who, if anyone, should be responsible for the chaos which has resulted? Certainly we cannot blame Crowe. Nor do we believe blame should be attached to Dr. Lockhart.

It is clear that the Board of Regents has acted unwisely in the matter from the start and the storm that has centred around Harry Crowe and Dr. Lockhart is only a side-show.

The support that has come to Crowe from faculty and students indicates that the real dispute lies between the hidebound Board of Regents and the intellectual class they try to dominate. The unyielding attitude, the narrowness of outlook and inability of this administration to compromise has precipitated the battle in which Crowe and Dr. Lockhart, as champions of the two causes, are only the most colorful fighters.

Our Readers Write: Color-phobia

Dear Sir:

Perhaps there is some justification for the belief in a superior race or color, though there is no foundation for this — scientifically or biologically. This mild quip has been brought to my mind by a recent set of experiences as enjoyed by a friend and myself one afternoon in bright and sunny August. We set out house-hunting in the intellectual university area — College to Bloor Sts., covering Huron, Willcocks, Harbord and Classic Sts. But before our mission was completed we were to learn many true and hard facts of the degree of ignorance and illiteracy that can still exist. The majority of our prospective landladies tried to be very pleasing.

In one case the room for rent was said to be no longer in the building but had, by a simple gesture of the owner's hand vanished a few blocks down the street; in another, only women were said to be acceptable, while a neighbour suddenly remembered that the apartment for rent was no longer empty and so cunningly removed the sign. (This sign subsequently reappeared — an accidental occurrence, of course). In yet another case, this kindly landlady at first hinted that her rooms were only for students, then said the price would be beyond our reach. However, seeing that we persistently stood our ground and asked to inspect the rooms, she lost all power of co-ordination and coherent speech and mumbled words we could not decipher, then jerking like some demonized being she had the presumption to close the door in our faces.

That all the above should occur — and in such close proximity to our intellectual centre — is rather revolting to any intelligent sense of reason. Furthermore, living in what is supposed to be an ultra-modern and civilized era with all its comprehensive facilities for education, there can be no excuse for justifying ignorance as evidenced by the incident. Yet it is surprising to what levels human beings can fall — unmindful of the universal law of common equality, brotherhood and humanity to all peoples.

The above article has been prompted by an inner feeling that would not complacently accept any ignoring of behaviour of the above (as cited in the last example). It should be also pointed out that incidents like the above can only be looked down upon, and people who act like this are only humiliating themselves and our race. In conclusion I wish to say that I can hold no resentment against the above persons, as much as I strongly condemn their action, for it is not their fault but the fault of the system that produces them.

Beat Dayhops

Dear Sir:

On the whole, I think Mr. Brouke is right about the apathy of Canadian SMC day-students. Most of us do participate in few extra-curricular activities, and, I'm afraid, are inclined to sit and bemoan the fact that American students are more influential in the college than we.

But Mr. Brouke seems to be unaware of one good reason for day-students' "apathy" in college activities:—our time is not, like that of the residents, concentrated completely on campus. Since we spend most days from nine to four or five at the university, we owe it to our families to be at home during the evenings, the time when most of the college activities are held. And most day-students participate in at least one or two activities off-campus which together with work at home, leave little spare time. Often the chance of getting supper at a restaurant and attending the meeting of a club or organization is a luxury the day-student cannot permit himself.

I repeat, however, that Mr. Bourke is right. These considerations by no means justify our attitude.

PATRICIA PURCELL, II SMC.

Lockhart's Case

Dear Sir:

Dr. Lockhart has been able to give a sufficiently adequate explanation of the circumstances leading up to the United College scandal to show that he cannot really be blamed for reading Professor Crowe's letter. At the same time, it is clear that the information the letter contained was private and even if he cannot be blamed for it, Dr. Lockhart did not really have any right to know about it.

The one thing I think we can say this man did wrong in the situation, was to act on the information he had inadvertently received. The only thing that could have made Professor Crowe's dismissal in order would have been a failure to acceptably perform his job.

Dan Goldstick, I UC

Christ In Christmas

By PAT LOGAN

The Christmas Belongs to Christ campaign is conducted annually on this campus by a group of students representing various colleges, faculties and religious organizations. Annually the campaign is met with the jeers of atheists, the scorn of self-righteous Christians, and the apathy of the remainder of the student body. The origin of this criticism perhaps lies in the fact that the purpose of the campaign is either misunderstood or not known.

It is not our aim to wage a holy war against all atheists. Our campaign is directed to the Christian students on the University of Toronto campus. Nor are we iconoclasts, striving to destroy all the time-honored traditions which surround the Christmas season.

If our campaign must be given a negative approach, it would be aimed at the apathy with which the average student regards Christmas in its religious significance.

We believe that the original and true meaning of Christmas must be recognized for a proper celebration of the Christmas season. The essence of Christmas is love—the love of God for mankind as personified by Christ, and the return-love of mankind for its Creator.

For centuries Christians have recognized this central element of Christmas and have founded upon it the customs which we now accept as part of our Christmas celebration. The custom of giving gifts to loved ones, to children through a spirit of love known to us as Santa Claus, are founded on love. The sending of Christmas greetings cards, and paying visits to friends are other customs which have their origin in an attempt to express this love.

Therefore we have no intention of trying to destroy any of these well-established traditions. The purpose of our campaign is to try to make the students of this campus aware, actively aware, of the motivating principle behind their celebration of the Christmas season. If there is a deep realization in our minds of the central fact of Christmas—the birth of Christ—and a strong conviction of the spirit if love which should attend the celebration of the event, there will be no need on our part to raise a hue and cry against the secularism, the commercialism of the Christmas season. From this conviction will follow necessarily the proper attitude toward Christmas.

It is our hope and firm belief that as this idea is spread and adopted, the disturbing secular and commercial aspects of Christmas will subside gradually and finally be placed in a subservient position to the true religious character of the season.

A night in Saroyan's Cave

When Trinity College Dramatic Society set out to present 'The Cave Dwellers', they were batting on a very sticky wicket from the start; but thanks to the brilliant direction of Pamela Terry and some outstanding individual performances, Trinity College emerged triumphant from the dark of the caves.

Critics have hailed this play as a work of tenderness and beauty. This is not so. It certainly contains some admirable drama and emotion, as we have come to expect from Saroyan, but its stark reality and brutal philosophy could hardly be called tender. At any rate the Trinity production enables us to see this side of Saroyan, which is a welcome change from the usual oversentimentalized presentation of his plays.

The honours of the evening must go to Ruth Ann Scott, as the Queen; for, after a bad start—where she appeared to be wrestling with an Irish accent—she emerged as the most convincing character of the play. She, more than anyone else, achieved some coherent continuity of plot, and her performance must rank as remarkable.

Perhaps the most important, and certainly the most difficult part, was that of the King, played by Thomas Drew-Brook, which required an actor of high calibre. This, unfortunately, was one of the few faults in this production, for the interpretation, although admirable in many ways, lacked polish and tended to lose the sympathy of the audience.

Worthy of commendation was Jackie Burroughs, who played the part of The Girl extremely competently and with great sensitivity.

The most complex character study was undoubtedly that of The Duke (Willson MacTavish) who, as an ex-prizefighter had to cope with the declared love of the girl (a love that he did not share), and the memory of a lost fight that had ruined his career. MacTavish's performance improved during the play and he made the most of a disappointing finale.

The highlight of the evening was reached at the entrance of the mute boy (Jamie Cunningham). We received the whole impact of this scene, and as we sat transfixed watching the boy's every moment, a pin could have been heard to drop in Hart House, (unusual in this theatre where the seats persist in creaking at dramatic moments). Pamela Terry achieved here moments of extreme tension and drama.

Saroyan's predilection for animals on his stage takes the form of Gorki, a bear in this play. The inclusion of animals often poses problems, but Trinity seemed to deal adequately with Gorki, except for his entrance, which leant towards the farcical, and completely lost its significance and intended effect.

The most creditable element of Trinity's production was to be found in the excellent pace, established at the onset and sustained throughout. This is not easy in a play which is divided into so many short scenes, and where the continuity is therefore doubly difficult to sustain; yet we never found moments that dragged or lacked vitality.

CBC's "Salesman" Has Mixed Success

CBC Folio on Tuesday night attempted to adapt Arthur Miller's DEATH OF A SALESMAN to the TV screen with mixed success. Not that the CBC did not try hard enough: Montreal-born Silvio Narizzano, recently named British TV's top producer by the Guild of Television Producers and Directors, was brought back specially for the production; and Albert Dekker, an excellent U.S. actor, was brought to Toronto to play the leading role. But the whole attempt suffered from a lack of insight into the type of dramatic form needed.

Narizzano should have taken a lesson from Miller himself, in the author's comments on the failure of the movie of Salesman. "It may be in place to remark in this connection, that while the play was sometimes called cinematographic in its structure, it failed as a motion picture. I believe that the basic reason—aside from gross insensitivity—permeating its film production—was that the dramatic tension of Willy's memories was destroyed by transferring him, literally, to the locales he had only imagined in the play. There is an inevitable horror in the spectacle of a man losing consciousness of his immediate surroundings to the point where he engages in conversations with unseen persons. The horror of this is lost—and drama becomes narrative—when the context actually becomes his imagined world." CBC did not fall into this exact trap, but their error was of a similar kind. In presenting most of the flashbacks in the play, the camera moved in, and blocked out the background, leaving Willy and his visions in an unreal world of forms and shadows. Because of this, the play suffered from a lack of continuity. The world of Willy's mind and the real outside world clashed in a way that Miller never intended. The form of the play depends on the fact that in Willy's mind the voice of the past is as strong as the voice of the present. Past and present should come out in one interrupted continuum. "If I could, I would have told the whole story and set forth all the characters in one unbroken speech or even one sentence or a single flash of light," says Miller, expressing his strong desire for a unity in the dramatic form of the play.

The cameraman's technique in scenes, other than those of the 'flashbacks' only contributed to the disturbing discontinuity of this production. The camera was constantly brought close up to the actors, so that the sets came through as a jumble of weird angles in bits and pieces. Why couldn't the camera move back and give us a view of the actors working against the whole of the stark sets, a visual relationship so effective in a stage production? The mere unity of the stage sets could have done much to make the action more cohesive, and to give a less disorganized feeling to CBC's presentation. The close-ups had the additional failing of putting too great a burden on the actors, who did not always succeed in carrying the whole weight of the dramatic through facial expressions alone. Much was wanting in the camera work. It contributed to the lack of unity, which was the chief failing of this production.

The acting was competent; and even exciting at times; but a general lack of sustained excellence was somewhat of a disappointment as we viewed the performers. Everyone seemed acutely aware that this was a great play, the lines were uttered with tense feeling but confidence, and sincerity were missing. It is difficult to criticize the individual performances, as they were all passable without being distinctive. No one individual interpretation stood out against another. Albert Dekker, the figure who suffered most from the production difficulties, tended to go along with the production, rather than carry it. He reached great moments of anguish, tragedy and comedy, but showed no evidence of a real sense of kinship with Willy's personality. Amelia Hall was a sympathetic soft-core Linda, who should have showed more grit. Leslie Nielsen, who played Biff, on the other hand, managed to radiate a real sincerity. His portrayal was sensitive, although it was sometimes less interesting to watch than those of Miss Hall, or Mr. Dekker who continually gave us some very interesting moments of characterization.

CBC took on a tough job when they decided to present Miller's Salesman. Miller's skill does not lie in any excellence of language than can forgo the necessity of a complete dramatic realization using all the elements of theatre. Perhaps this was at the root of CBC's lack of success on Tuesday night. In aspects of individual character, in the musical background, even perhaps in the interpretation of Willy's first state of mind, the CBC presentation showed remarkable insight and delicacy. All that was missing and this unfortunately was the most vital element of the drama, was the overall unity that Miller felt so earnestly was necessary.

Annual Welcome for Malcolm Sargent

It's apparently become an annual pleasure for Toronto to welcome Sir Malcolm Sargent, the eminent British conductor. In his "retirement" from the podium of the BBC Symphony, he is more active than ever, producing new recordings and guest-conducting orchestras all over the world.

This week, besides the Sunday Pops and the CBC Symphony, he is conducting the pair of regular subscription concerts with the TSO in Massey Hall. Three of the four works he has chosen are by British composers.

Brahms is the odd apple in the barrel. This composer's huge Fourth Symphony (E-minor) formed the second half of the program. Sargent's interpretation is not colder than we are used to, but his expression relies more on the variation of dynamics than on tempo. We felt that his decisive approach contributed much to the forthright character of this symphony.

Especially in the second movement, which for us is the most beautiful of anything Brahms wrote, Sargent achieved a balance of tempo and dynamics which conveyed fully the tender tragedy of the music. Elsewhere, however, it must be admitted that more of the romantic expression could have been elicited by a freer nuance of tempo.

Vaughan Williams' Overture to The Wasps (a Greek satirical comedy by Aristophanes) opened the program. Sargent's reading is witty. Notably in the rasping, troubled string tremolos we felt a thrill of something close to terror. The character of the overture is chiefly that of the Chorus in the play, a swarm of wasps.

Delius' idyllic "Walk to the Paradise Garden" afforded a marked contrast. The work is staid in tenor, quite different from the epicurean calm of Beethoven's slow movements. Sargent's reading is fully sympathetic to Delius' mood. We have seldom heard the TSO give forth with more beautifully phrased music. In spite of Delius' air of eternal calm, never once was our attention allowed to stray.

Sargent, of course, is noted for his interpretation of Elgar's Enigma Variations, the fourth number on the program. His mastery of the score is complete. These variations were more than vignettes of Elgar's friends: they were three-dimensional cameos, each a well rounded, complete whole in itself.

For example, the innate power of the Nimrod section (Variation IX) was slowly but deliberately marshalled toward the broad climax. The opening measures were very slow, and well sustained by the orchestra. As the music moved to its completion, the various orchestral forces built up a grand and impassioned wave of sound that, almost suddenly, broke itself and quietly slipped away. Sargent's control over the orchestra and their response to him produced the ideal morendo: the music didn't stop, it just reached the point where it wasn't to be heard any longer. This indeed was the test for both orchestra and conductor, and they were not found wanting.

TED BARNES.

Blood And Rust

THE DECKS RAN RED (Downtown, etc.), the viewer sees red and the box office ledger will probably show red; and all with just cause.

Herein, screenwriter-director Andrew Stone attempts to recount what the opening credits refer to as "the most infamous and diabolical crime that ever happened in nautical history." His helplessly mediocre handling of this supposedly factual story, however, makes it all appear like a lot of blorney.

Once upon a time, we are told, there was a first officer James Macon, who wanted to be a captain, so they gave him the rustiest old muck bucket afloat and let him sweat. And sweat he did, for it seems that this same rig, the SS Berwin by name, was infested by the nastiest pack of sea-rats that ever walked on two legs. Down in the boiler room, planning to murder the entire crew and collect salvage money on the cargo were two old salts (Broderick Crawford, Stewart Whitman), who obviously had read the wrong sections of marine law. Up in the galley, sensuously oozing from her skin tight dresses, was Dorothy Dandridge, a brown-skinned gal with more steam than the boilers.

Things began to happen and happen fast, but in the end that fairy godmother known as Hollywood came to the rescue before the decks got too red. Nothing, however, has saved this from being one of the dullest bits of nautical celluloid to float by in some time.

The situation itself is a fascinating one, a story that would possibly make a gripping half hour television drama. Prosaically served up as a 90minute film, however, its story-line soon runs thin. Actor Mason's sotto voce underplaying leaves him somewhere below decks; as for bad boys Crawford and Whitman, their ham is sliced a bit thicker, but is nonetheless tasteless.

For nautical thrills, a cruise to Hanlan's Point would probably offer more than this uninspired attempt at suspense. Ted Schafer

On The Rocks Varsity Romance Breaks

A romance that promised to be the University of Toronto's most glamorous affair of the season went on the rocks yesterday.
 Warren Wilson, Varsity AM&D editor and his fiancée, 20-year-old Holly Rattigan, split early yesterday afternoon after an Arbor Room snit that observers say lasted well over 20 minutes.
 "I have nothing to say about the whole, distasteful matter," editor Wilson said yesterday. "It's over and that's all there is to it."
 Miss Rattigan, an extension course student of Russian and Oriental culture was not available for comment last night.
 First public notice of the romance came less than a week ago when the couple announced their plans to wed along with two other Varsity couples.
 Friends of the couple say that Miss Rattigan, who is employed by the Rathbone-Harwell Chemical Appliance Co. Ltd. as a laboratory analyst met Wilson on campus shortly after 3.30 p.m. yesterday.
 The argument apparently arose during a discussion by the couple of William Saroyan's play, "The Cave-Dwellers."
 Explained graduate student Larry Zolf, present at the time, "They were talking about the play, disagreed, and suddenly started hurling personal insults."
 Wilson denied there had been any question of fidelity involved.
 The two met in Montreal this summer, Wilson said, while engaged in work with the musical comedy "Rye and Ginger." The two met for the first time when chosen at random for an interview by a local television station.

 About 1,000 fourth-year engineers began a three-day round of employment interviews this morning.
 Arrangements for interviews have been going on for two weeks. Each student of practical science, geological sciences, mathematics, physics, applied mathematics, chemistry and related subjects is allowed eight interviews from the 102 companies offering jobs.
 More can be arranged later if necessary.
 Colonel J. K. Bradford, University Placement Service Director, said last night that over 1,600 permanent and summer jobs had been found for engineering students last year.
 "This year we expect at least as many jobs as last year; maybe a few more," he added.
 "About 75 per cent of all engineering jobs open in Canada last year went to U of T students."

ICE BLUES LOSE FOUR

Varsity Hard Hit By Injury - Bug Four May Miss Carabin Game

The very tired as well as beaten Varsity Hockey Blues returned home last night. Never able to finish as strongly as they began their games Blues went down to defeat to both Colorado College and Denver University in their last two contests.

Again grabbing the lion's share of the penalties, Blues lost 9-7 to Colorado Tigers on Monday night.

Colorado's Bob Kohoot opened scoring within the first minute of play in the first period. He scored again at 9:53 of the frame, assisted both times by Bob Tanner.

Varsity finally hit the scoring column on a goal by Lorry Stacey assisted by Dave Stephen.

Jack Smith scored for Tigers before Mike Elik ended the period with a Varsity goal. John Macdonald and Harry Neale assisted.

Varsity received four minor penalties to Colorado's two.

Blues went ahead 7-5 in the second frame, scoring as many goals in this period as they had in the series to date.

Stacey garnered an unassisted tally. Grant Mills scored from Frank Sullivan and Neale. Sullivan scored from Brodie, Stephen from Don Fleming, and Neale scored on an unassisted play.

Three minors were awarded Blues,* one to Tigers.

Unfortunately, the third period scorewise, belonged exclusively to Colorado. They pumped four goals past Ray Dunn, forward Doug Whiteside scoring one and assisting on three more.

Varsity again combined for seven out of nine penalties, including a match to Howie (Li'l Bar) Roth for roughing a referee.

Misfortune struck two-fold as well, Elik and Watt joining Ron Casey on the injury column.

Varsity blasted 34 shots on goal, Colorado 58.

A badly depleted Varsity crew met Denver University Pioneers on Tuesday night, and went down by an 8-3 count.

They set a personal record, however, by not placing a single man in the penalty box.

Pioneers scored three goals in the first period, while Varsity retaliated with two. A make-shift line of Brodie, Kennedy and Macdonald scored all Blues' goals.

Kennedy scored unassisted at 4:47 of the period. Dunc Brodie, who was the major power for the Blues throughout the series, pounded one home at 12:38. Kennedy and Macdonald were awarded the assists.

In the second frame, Pioneers ran their lead to 5-2, before Varsity garnered what proved to be their last goal of the series.

John Godfrey scored for Denver on assists by George Konik and Paul Josephson at 4:53 of the period. Jim Brown scored again at 10:57, assisted by Bill Masterton and Con Collie.

At 15:13, Brodie skated in unassisted to score for Blues.

True to form Varsity collapsed in the final stanza, Pioneers pumping in three unanswered goals. Masterton figured on all three of them, bringing his total game scoring to two goals and four assists.

Varsity plied the rubber at their opponents 35 times, while Denver peppered Bob Giroux 45 times.

The trip was an unlucky one for Blues in more ways than one.

Sidelined with injuries, and probably unable to play this Friday, are Mike Elik, Ron Casey, Dunc Brodie, and Tom Watt. Both Red Stephen and Grant Mills have received cuts about the head that required stitches.

Inter Faculty Summary

St. Mike's captured the lacrosse championship in Hart House yesterday afternoon, by whipping UC 20-8.

The defending champion UC squad led St. Mike's 2-1 after the closely contested first period. St. Mike's roared back, however, to score seven goals in the second frame, and twelve in the third.

Mike Clark was the big gun for the winners, by sinking ten big goals. Kevin Wheeler counted four goals while Paul O'Neil sank three, Curt Russell two, and Ron Shepherd tallied a singleton.

Bert Naylor led UC scorers with six goals, while Jim Hill and Jim Spence notched one each.

The Irish claim the Dr. Bill Dafoe trophy by defeating UC 2-1 in the best of three series.

In hockey action Trinity A defeated UC II, 6-1. Campbell notched two goals for the winners, Higgins, Ross, Smith and Farr sinking one each. Ross scored the lone UC goal.

Vic III edged Med II, 4-2, with Weiler sinking all four goals for the winners, while Sims and Duke countered for Meds.

In squash play, Jr. SPS defeated Trinity B by a 2-1 score.

with Coach Jack Kennedy, the Varsity Sports staff learned several important facts.

It cannot be denied that the altitude at Colorado was an important factor in the outcome of the series. Although there is no doubt that the American colleges may both boast excellent hockey teams, the feeling persists that had the series been played at Varsity Arena, the outcome would have been quite different.

At any rate, welcome home, Blues. It's good to have you back.

Cage Blues Win 73 - 57

By MIKE CHYKALIUK
Varsity Staff Reporter

The Basketball Blues displayed a complete reversal of form Tuesday night by thrashing Toronto Donns Seniors 73 to 57 at the St. Michael's gymnasium.

Varsity forged ahead on Don Lipke's game opening eight points. They then maintained the advantage by out-hustling the tiring Seniors throughout the contest.

Offensively Blues enjoyed an exceptional evening, scoring on more than fifty percent of their shots.

In addition to Lipke, who garnered 13 points, John Dachyshyn was again a two way standout, chipping in with 17 tallies.

Jimmy Maguire, a 6 foot 5 inch rookie from Kirkland Lake, also stood out defensively, snaring numerous rebounds.

Attempting to hold the Fort for the Donns was Wright with 16 and Osborn with 14 points.

Blues in exhibition contests this season won two, and lost three against teams from the Toronto Senior League.

Tonight they step into faster company when they tangle with a top US college team from St. St. Peters, New York. The contest will take place in St. Peters. Last year Blues' hosts were victorious by a count of 97 to 61.

Lineups: Toronto — Paterson 4, Menczel 2, Potter 6, Richmond 9, Dachyshyn 17, Stulac 5, Norman 5, McGuire 4, Lipke 13, Goldring 6, Russell 2, Total 73. Donns — Wright 16, Cooper 0, Cohen 6, Edelist 5, Osborne 14, Monnott 6, Monroe 0, Lewis 4, Thomas 0, Singleton 6, Litvack 0, Total 57.

Female Hoopsters Clash OCE and PHE Winners Finals In Play Friday

By ANN TOTENHAM

OCE and PHE II reached the finals of the women's basketball by defeating Vic. Freshies and PHE III respectively in the semi-finals at Hart House.

In the first game of the evening, OCE playing very strongly on the offensive, swamped a weaker Vic. team 57-29. From the start the outcome of the game was never in doubt and OCE, sparked by Marilyn Parkinson, were leading 26-4 at half time.

The Scarlet and Gold rallied in the last two periods and put up a good fight. Their forwards made some very good shots but the guards had a hard time competing with the smoothly playing forward line of their opponents.

By far the most outstanding player of the game was Marilyn Parkinson who scored 28 points. Other high scorers were Nancy Fleming (14), also for OCE, Jane Dunstan (14) and Heather Burns (10) for Vic. Freshies.

The other game was a hard-fought battle from start to finish as the two PHE teams met in a sisterly clash. Both teams struggled vigorously for every point, with the result that there were many fouls called on both sides.

The score saw-sawed back and forth in the first three periods and very often was tied. In the final quarter the sophomores managed to maintain a slim lead to win 41-39.

High scorer for PHE II was Marilyn Hutt (13) and for PHE III June Sceviour with 18 points.

Be sure not to miss the final game to be played this Friday at 8 p.m. at Hart House. The consolation final will take place immediately before it. Both games will be basketball of a high calibre and well worth seeing.

Another basketball classic was played on Monday night. At the annual St. Hilda's basketball night 579 showed amazing agility for their years and won the trophy by defeating all comers.

Matmen Top West End Y

Friday night at the Hart House gymnasium, Senior Blues Grapplers won four of eight feature matches from the Toronto West End Y.

Bill Polito, Rod Carrow, and the Brown brothers, Herb and Frank, accounted for all the victories.

Most of the matches were well contested, with the one between Varsity's Don Shepley and the Y's Rocky Sirianni perhaps being the most lively. Sirianni, behind on points, emerged the victor after a stirring comeback that almost flattened his opponent.

The feature of the meet was the contrast in styles displayed by the two teams. Varsity employed a riding manoeuvre that was designed to tire their opponents, while the Y preferred a more ruthless grab the head and tear it off method.

Blues' switches, defensive tricks used to regain the advantage, were also a pleasure to behold.

Following is a summary of the results:

130 lbs — John Coulton, Y, pinned Don Bannister, V. 137 lbs — Doug Gropp, Y, pinned Andy Higgins, V. 147 lbs — Bill Polito, Y, outpointed Harry Longworth, V. 157 lbs — Rocky Sirianni, Y, outpointed Don Shepley, V. 167 lbs — Al Mitchell, Y, outpointed Roger Dover, V. 191 lbs — Rod Carrow, V, pinned Ed Flynn, Y. 191 lbs — Herb Brown, V, outpointed Felix Tatum, Y. Heavyweight — Frank Brown, V, outpointed Esko Ojanen, Y.

Baby Blues Top Mac

Varsity Intermediates outscored McMaster Marauders 4-2 yesterday afternoon, in a well played exhibition clash at Varsity Arena.

Showing surprising speed and stamina for the first game of the season, both teams failed to score in the first period.

Walt James opened Varsity scoring early in the second frame with a goal from Gord Frey. Peter Randle tallied another marker for Intermediates a minute later. Veteran Pete Warran assisted on the play. Randle scored again at 12:58, deflecting Bill Griffin's shot.

McMaster's first goal came from the stick of Bob McLelland who banged in a rebound. Russ Mason and Ritch Ferguson garnered the assists.

Varsity closed the period with a goal that came a second after the bell sounded to end play.

With both sides playing with a man short, Marauders' Dave Milencoff combined with Bob Brown and Ross Mason to put McMaster within striking distance. The goal came at 48 seconds of the third period.

Paul Findlay, however, scored the insurance goal for Intermediates two minutes later. Bill Cawkell assisted on the play.

Varsity showed a lot of power and depth for so early in the season.

The play of goalie Bob Hollyman, who guarded the nets for the first half of the game, was outstanding. He turned aside 17 shots in a shutout performance.

Defensively Varsity also proved very strong, carrying the puck out of their own zone very well, and supplying solid protection about their own net.

With a lot of speed in the attacking squads, coach Wheldrake should develop a lot of scoring punch in the club.

McMaster lacked bench strength. Playing only eleven men, they carried the puck well, but sadly lacked co-ordination inside their own blue line, and on the attack.

The quality of the hockey was excellent. The Baby Blues supply a free-wheeling, and fast game of hockey, providing plenty of spectator thrills.

There's never a dull moment in my job as a Bell Service Representative. I like talking with people and there's a surprising amount of enjoyable challenge in the work.

"I joined the Bell in May 1957 and when I had been working with the company for a while, I married and moved to Oakville, Ont. (I'm happy to say I met with no difficulty whatsoever in having a transfer arranged.) But wherever you work at this job, the variety of human interest makes the work a pleasure.

"There are many other fascinating types of work at the Bell, too. Several of my college acquaintances also chose to join the company — some of them after trying other work — and are happy they did!"

Profs Here Rap United Board

The entire staff of the University of Toronto's History Department last night voiced their "profound dismay at the recent actions of the Board of Regents of United College, Winnipeg."

In a statement released to the press last night, the 22 members of the History Department said the recent actions of the Board "make it plain that they virtually refuse to consider any suitable basis for the settlement of the case of Prof. Harry Crowe, who was summarily dismissed from the staff of the College."

"The Principal, Dr. W. C. Lockhart, by submitting his own resignation, did his part to open the way for a settlement," the statement continued.

"The final responsibility for the deplorable situation at United College now rests squarely upon the Board.

"Whatever may be the many other considerations in the tragic and complicated chain of events at United College, this point is obvious: the arbitrary and ill-considered conduct of the Board of Regents is alienating the academic community across Canada and is threatening the very existence of the College.

"Its destruction, which is a distinct possibility, would be a calamity," the statement said.

"We have hesitated to intervene even to this extent in such a highly controversial matter, but we do believe that it is a question which concerns university education throughout Canada."

"For this reason we feel that it is important to express our opinion that only an unmistakable gesture of conciliation on the part of the College authorities can provide a basis for a satisfactory settlement.

Prof. D. G. Creighton, head of the department, last night said, "The entire staff signed the statement." He had no further comment to make.

prevent incidents.

Move Will Alter Parliament Rules

The Model Parliament committee chairman last night announced the committee has moved to prevent a recurrence of an incident which almost toppled the Progressive Conservative government last year.

Chairman Sue Davis also announced the parliament will be held Jan. 13, 14 and 15.

In this year's Parliament, the government party will automatically receive a three-seat majority over the opposition, with the two opposition parties dividing the remaining seats on the basis of the ratio of votes received.

The division of the house will thus be 50 government to 47 opposition seats. Last year's Progressive Conservative government received a majority of only 49 to 48.

"We hope that we'll have a little more stability in the House and that we'll avoid another Duckworth incident," Miss Davis said.

During last year's parliament, Peter Duckworth, a Conservative member, failed to vote against an opposition amendment to a PC education bill.

The amendment, proposed by CCF opposition leader John Brewin, called for free education. Duckworth said he had intended to vote for the amendment.

But the speaker ruled in favor of a government motion for adjournment before a recount could be taken, despite vociferous opposition protests.

Contacted last night, Duckworth said he thinks the majority increase is a "very good idea." He said he may sit for the Conservatives again this year.

CCF party chief Jerry Caplan also supported the move. The spirit of the Model Parliament, he said, is "basically stability". The Duckworth incident last year, he said, caused an "unnecessary ruckus."

But Dick Hamilton, Liberal president, said he thinks the increase is "not terribly necessary." It came about, he said, "because the majority party is afraid not all their members will be sitting there."

Miss Davis said she hopes for a vote of 3,000 this year. Last year's turnout was 2,900 but three new voting booths are to be set out—at the Ontario College of Education, the Law School and the Library.

The three campus political parties have done a "terrific job" of turning out campaign literature with such short notice, she said.

Governor-general in this year's Parliament will be Hart House Warden Joseph McCulley, Miss Davis said.

Speaker on Jan. 15 will be Jerry Case, Students' Administrative Council chairman. Speaker for the first two days has yet to be announced.

Voting day is Wednesday, Dec. 17.

Men Nabbed For Entering Whitney

For the second time in less than a week, males have invaded Whitney Hall, the University College Women's Residence.

Police were called early Wednesday morning when the night portress at the residence heard noises on the second floor and called them.

About 2 a.m. she heard the noises.

Police arrived within a few minutes and reported an open window on the ground floor.

The night portress discovered one of the intruders in a dining room and the police took him into custody.

His companion, who had not entered the building, was arrested by the officers while awaiting the return of his companion.

Metro police officials contacted last night said the two had not been charged.

"As far as we know no one has laid a complaint, and we can't charge in a case of this nature," a police spokesman said last night.

Another unidentified male prowler had entered the residence about midnight Tuesday.

Set Deadline

Editor John Robert Colombo (IV UC) announced last night that the deadline for all contributions to "Jargon", the all-campus literary magazine, will be Feb. 1.

"We have already received three contributions from Meds," Colombo said, "and two or three from Arts."

The magazine, which will contain 48 pages, will be printed in two colors, as well as black and white, he continued.

First press run will be 3,500 copies, some of which will be sent to reviewers all across Canada.

"If we put out a good magazine we'll increase the press run," said Colombo.

Contributions are invited from all students on campus. Poetry, fiction, reviews, and articles will all be included in the magazine.

"Payment will be made for all original contributions accepted," he said.

Manuscripts should be submitted either to the college reps or to Editor Colombo, at Sir Daniel Wilson residence.

The editorial board includes Jay MacPherson, Hugo MacPherson, and Milton Wilson. The decision of the editor will be final and binding for all material.

"We hope to make the magazine completely self-supporting," said Colombo. A nominal charge will be made for it, probably about 75 cents.

"This is the best opportunity U of T students have ever had to write seriously for a literary magazine," the editor said. "Anyone with literary abilities should avail themselves of the opportunity right away. There are almost two months before the deadline, and we hope to see some excellent material," he said.

Blinded Dog Club To Let Women In Ranks

The notorious Blinded Dog Society, up to now an undercover organization, has come into the open.

Coinciding with the move into the spheres of legality the Society plans to triple its membership and to admit women to full membership. BD Charles Testart (I SPS) said last night.

The decision was made at a policy meeting yesterday after groundwork had been laid at earlier meetings, he continued.

Several girls, all from St. Hilda's, petitioned for membership about six weeks ago," he said.

BD Glen Wooldridge (II SPS) said, "We just had to have them. One reason is that they've got some great ideas for activities next term."

Previous activities have included stealing and painting the Varsity's car last year, erecting a 20-foot Blinded Dog on the front campus, and kidnapping seven campus leaders for ransom. Thirty dollars was raised in this venture and was turned over to United Appeal.

Wooldridge announced that membership will be increased from 25 to 75. 25 of whom will be women.

"No more than 60 percent of either the male or female membership will be drawn from any one faculty," said BD Bruce Ross (I Vic). "This is a safeguard to make sure we aren't overrun with either Engineers or St. Hilda's girls," he added.

"Membership presently is drawn from SPS, Vic, and now St. Hilda's." Ross continued. "We hope to have representatives in every major faculty by the end of the spring."

The Society has also planned to send a Christmas basket of food to a needy family in the Toronto area. Members said the Society plans to undertake several public services in the future.

WUS Applications . . .

Sue Evans, U of T World University Service co-chairman last night announced application forms for this year's WUS seminar in the West Indies are now available in the Students' Administrative Council Offices.

Application deadline is Jan. 20. The selection board will meet between Jan. 20 and Jan. 30 and the successful candidates will be announced early in February.

WUS plans an evening early next term for students interested in applying to have a chance to chat with West Indian students and experts on the West Indies.

Xmas Cheer

Once again the Christmas atmosphere imposes itself on the dull routine of life, stirring winter spirits with a rosy glow.

As holly and sleigh bells, roaring hearths and the joy of Christmas shopping warms our spirits, the editor of The Varsity takes this opportunity to remind students of an important fact.

Christmas this year falls on December 25 — just another SAC service.

Share Not Very Happy
As Campaign Winds Up

The Share committee chairman last night said she couldn't "really say I'm happy" with the $3,157 netted by Share by the end of its second last day of campaigning.

Last year's total receipts totalled about $4,700, she said.
Miss Evans said she expects

But, she said, "I don't really think you can say the campaign has been a success."

Tradition Dead

Meds killed a tradition Wednesday when tickets for the faculty show "Daffydil" went on sale outside the faculty.

It is the first time in the revue's history that all the tickets were not sold within the faculty.

Last night, 400 tickets remained to be sold out of an original 2,500.

Highlights of the "completely original" revue include an operetta-ballet, an Arabian sequence with "exotic hours" and a take-off on a Texas medic. Daffydil chairman Ross Prince said early this week.

All participants in the show are members of the medical faculty, including the orchestra and girls' kickline.

The show will run in Hart House Theatre Dec. 15-19. Tickets cost $1.50 and are available at Hart House box-office or at the Medical Society office.

Wintermeyer Talks Here Keeps Platform In Dark

The leader of the Ontario Liberal party last night called upon his party to formulate a new long-range plan without which it "could not justify its existence." J. J. Wintermeyer, speaking at a meeting of the U of T Liberal Club, said the Liberals must revitalize their party, adding new people and new ideals on both the federal and provincial levels.

After criticizing the Frost administration's handling of highway construction and education policies, Mr. Wintermeyer requested questions from the floor.

"This is my first opportunity to speak to a university organization," he said, "and I would like to hear your views or questions."

Asked what was the Liberal Provincial platform, Mr. Wintermeyer said he should talk at present about Liberal policy and principles, and wait for election time and "specific issues" before speaking of platform. As an opposition

U.S. Diplomat Here Speaks Of 'Patience'

The American Vice-consul in Toronto told the U of T United Nations Club last night "the United States will overlook no opportunity for negotiation with those who disagree with us."

Vice-Consul A. K. Jean said "the record of the United States in negotiations is one of patience."

Mr. Jean outlined the reasons why the United Nations has not accomplished all the things expected of it. The main reason he said was the lack of co-operation of the Soviet Union with the Western powers after the second World War.

Although the Western powers demobilized troops, the Soviet Union did not, he said.

Mr. Jean accused the Soviet Union of consistently blocking the establishment of the international force described in the charter, misusing the power of veto, refusing to allow its satellites to take part in the Marshall Plan and interfering in the Far East by "arms shipments, subversive activities and repeated threats."

"We also watched, with horror the murder of students and workers in Budapest," he said.

He described changes which had taken place in the UN such as a realization that the UN alone was powerless to prevent aggression.

"The response of most free nations (to this change) was slow in coming," he said, "but after Korea action was firm and rapid."

He said an "instinct for survival" was responsible for this action, and outlined the formation of NATO, SEATO and other alliances. Mr. Jean termed this practice a "doctrine of deterrence."

However he stressed that the UN is not a failure, since it is useful for "mobilizing moral force." He suggested the future be viewed "with realism, not cynicism."

Deny CCF Charges

Tory Model Parliament leader Jeremy Johnston (IV Trin), last night vehemently denied CCF charges that his party could not form a cabinet for the upcoming Model Parliament.

"The charge reflects typical CCF wishful thinking. Not only can we form a solid cabinet, we will," Johnston said.

CCF Parliament leader Hugh Peacock (II UC) charged Wednesday afternoon the Conservatives did not intend to seriously contest the election because they were unable to form a cabinet which would agree on policy.

"Our party is completely united on policy—the CCF has mistaken open discussion for dissent," Johnston said.

When we do name our cabinet both executive and rank-and-file members will be represented, he said.

Every now and then we pause between the pressures which play havoc with our daily lives to ask some basic questions.

We don't usually get anywhere, but it's an entertaining occupation.

One question we are asking ourselves as the campus switches on all boosters for the annual election is especially futile but proportionately entertaining.

What is the purpose of the Model Parliament? More basic, what the the functions of the campus political clubs?

There are two answers. The first, that the campus clubs are branches of the national parties and reflect their policies, doesn't help us very much. The prime purpose of the clubs is then to educate students in political attitudes and to try to develop or shape their future understanding of national issues.

If this is the case the Model Parliament becomes an extension of this training ground. It is a place where inexperienced and frequently ill-informed students can toss papier mache motions across an imaginary chamber.

The second answer is more realistic but perhaps less useful. The campus clubs are organizations designed to deal with student problems in relation to politics. If we take this view, the Model Parliament becomes a political students' council providing constructive debate on a few relative but very limited issues.

If we accept the first answer we would vote one way, if we accept the second answer we would vote another. The distinction is therefore important.

We prefer to accept the first answer — open as it is to the fantastic and the unrealistic. Good government depends, we are told, on a politically educated public. If we take the Model Parliament seriously enough, it will be an excellent medium for such education.

We suggest you vote, and vote as citizens of Canada and not merely as students of the University of Toronto.

In the long run you will be helping both yourselves and the country more.

But while you vote as citizens of Canada, your vote should be influenced by one important consideration, and if you bear this consideration in mind it will place the Model Parliament in a unique and vital position.

A university is an institution in which the mind can express itself freely without assuming the practical responsibilities of the world outside. It is a place for trial and error of extremist views and the testing ground for radical or reactionary principles.

While we would vote Conservative or Liberal as normal and responsible citizens because both are tried and experienced parties, Wednesday we will vote CCF—and we urge you to do the same.

Where else, except at a university, will the CCF be given a chance to act on its policy and stand up against the two national parties? Where else, except at a university, will the CCF learn the difference between being a government and being in opposition?

We have the rest of our lives to be timid, traditional and to play it safe.

This is our last chance to put Canadian socialism on trial. If it is found wanting, if its bills are found to be unpalatable and its efficiency as a government questionable, no permanent harm will be done.

Vote as citizens of Canada, but vote so as the papier mache replica of a federal chamber has a more definite purpose than to merely echo hollow speeches by better men.

Foreign Policy:

Believing that it urgent that greater emphasis be placed on positive means to ease international tensions and further the cause of peace, the CCF urges:

1) that the testing of nuclear weapons be immediately abandoned and banned by all countries.

2) That a concerted effort be made to move forward to a policy of progressive disarmament involving both nuclear and conventional weapons, subject to adequate international inspection and control through the United Nations.

3) The establishment of a neutralized zone in central Europe.

4) The CCF does not believe that regional pacts such as the Warsaw Pact, NATO, SEATO, the Baghdad Pact are effective answers to the creation of peaceful world relationships, and we look forward to the time when such military regional alliances can be eliminated.

5) That a permanent international police force be established under the UN.

6) That much greater emphasis be placed on the amount of economic aid given through such organizations as the Colombo Plan, and that Canada in the UN should advocate the establishment of a Special UN Fund for Economic Development.

Domestic Policy:

Education: We believe, as do others, that ability and academic interest, rather than financial status, must determine attendance in university.

We strongly propose that education at this level as at those below, should not require the payment of fees. Higher education is a privilege that should be earned, not bought.

Unemployment: This past fall the news of strikes has been given constant play by our daily newspapers. This sensationalism has merely obscured the real problem of labor in our economic life, namely, the disastrous amount of unemployment. We urge not only the cure but the prevention of unemployment in Canada by

1) building 200,000 low-cost, low rental homes

2) enough hospitals and other medical facilities to accommodate a complete national health plan

3) better highways from coast to coast, and immediate federal assistance to begin construction of the Toronto subway this year

4) by investment in Canadian mines, forests and factories so that Canadian resources will make jobs in Canada

5) a vastly expanded Aid and Trade program

6) substantial assistance for school construction

7) long term economic planning to promote stability and to avoid the boom and bust of our present economy

The Arts in Canada: The CCF recommends that the funds available to the Canada Council be substantially increased so that certain cultural organizations such as the National Ballet and the Toronto Symphony can be entirely supported by public funds and that a Canadian Repertoire Theatre be established which would be largely supported by public funds.

A

Christian's Credenti

By PHILIP WARD

A student was showing his friend through the rooms of Hart House one evening recently, and as they passed the chapel, he pointed it out, and added with a laugh "I've never been in there yet."

His laugh, more than his comment, betrayed the type of thinking that is unfortunately so prevalent in this university; religion was obviously something to laugh about, to be considered 'old-fashioned'. From the intellectual point of view, his manner was the sorrowful indication of a complete lack of consideration that there even might be a supernatural being; from the point of view of the Christian, that person appeared to have less chance of attaining the Kingdom of Heaven than an inquiring agnostic, who at least has shown interest and concern in knowing more about the existence, if any, of an after-life.

What is it that causes this careless attitude? Why are students so sceptical of religion, and Christianity in particular? Even this series of articles has met no response at all. I believe that the main cause is the fact that Christianity is judged on the basis of the of the average churchgoer rather than on that of the only perfect Christian, namely Christ. When a study is to be made of Islam or Buddhism, the lives of Muhammad and Buddha are examined; so it should be with Christianity. Admittedly, it is easy to watch one of the many who profess Christianity, see an inconsistency or mistake in his life, and promptly denounce the religion as contradictory or ineffective; but that is in the first place untrue: it is the man's personal profession that is contradictory or ineffective, not the religion itself; and, secondly, surely it is intellectual laziness not to gather evidence at the source.

This tendency is quite understandable; we live in what is claimed to be a 'Christian country'; we are surrounded by large numbers who fill churches every Sunday; and many of the restrictions on our lives are the result of pressure from myopic and narrowminded groups, who little realise the damage they are doing. It is most natural that anybody should react against such an unholy mess; so should the true Christian.

To evaluate Christianity, it is necessary to consider the claims of Christ, as recorded in the four gospels, in the same way that one reads the Koran, Muhammad's recitations, to evaluate Islam. Such a consideration can have only two conclusions: that Jesus was only a man, and a fanatic at that; or that he was the Son of God. It is scholastically dishonest to say that he was not God's son but that he was a great moral teacher; to reach this conclusion, one must pick and choose from what Jesus said, which is ridiculous: either all is genuine or none.

From this evaluation comes a hard but necessary decision; either to reject the whole, or to accept the belief that all men commit wrong in some form or other at some time in their lives; that God, being just, demands that the penalty be paid for that wrong; but that, since God also loves His own creatures, He has given His son to pay the penalty on our behalf; and that those who accept God's pardon through Christ, and put their whole faith in Him, become heirs of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Many find it hard to understand how a person can put such an unquestioning faith in an unseen person, for whom he is willing to die rather than deny his belief. Such is quite a reader writes:

Dear Sir:

Those critics of student politics, and especially of our Model Parliament, would perhaps be more sympathetic, in the light of the recent Crowe case, and similar, less-publicized incidents displaying the malicious actions of our own University administrations. If we are attempting to follow the lead of our Professors then the actions of former Model Parliaments can easily be condoned.

I suggest that this year's Model Parliament strongly support Prof. Crowe's case, and attempt to deal intelligently with Autocracy in our Universities.

natural, because one cannot stand faith in anything without experiencing it. As an illustration, imagine yourself entering a house at night; you have to find that all the light switches are under the door. Until you have found the right switch to light the room, you remain in the dark; you will only know it is the right switch when you have turned it and light has come on. Furthermore, light from the first switch will find others to light you throughout the house.

To other people, the difference Christianity provide food for thought; they are again judging religion's members rather than themselves, and other religions are means united: Islam has a number of sects; one hears of "orthodox" Jews; and condemn religion for many things that vary greatly. Nevertheless, it is no excuse and agreement on essentials of Christianity, if complete conformity, is greatly desired.

The obvious view that all this is that Christianity seems to have much effect on members. The reason is that it is easy to be a Christian, and says it is can hardly know true Christianity is; in the very difficult and can be achieved by allowing God to have complete control of your life does not mean that God will smoke or drink in his life. He thinks it is wrong, but he will not get him to Heaven. He gave His followers two commandments, which are the ancient laws of Moses: Love your neighbour — the practical implication of Christianity.

Whether you realise it or not, religion of some kind influences whether you are a monk, an ascetic or an avid worker. To the monk, God means everything to him; to the other fellow, nothing is so important than television. Between those two extremes is a god whom you worship once a week, a god who exists in every sphere of activity. Good is that god to you.

You will see in the Liberal Club platform for the Model Parliament policy statements regarding the Avro Arrow, a North Atlantic economic community, and aid to oral surgical institutions (dental surgical institutions). We feel that production of the CF-105 Arrow is necessary not only for the continued employment of the hundreds of Canadian aircraft workers, but also for the maintenance and health of Canada's aircraft industry. Continued research and development for this vital industry depends on production. The Arrow is recognized as a superior fighter-plane.

In the face of Russia's all-too-evident economic offensive we feel that the strength of Canada and the Western world lies in economic expansion. As Mr. Pearson puts it, "we cannot be prosperous, we cannot be economically stable, if we don't try to extend the boundaries of our prosperity and the boundaries of our stability beyond our own national boundaries."

At present oral surgeons are unable to operate in regular hospitals. Without infringing upon the rights of recognized doctors and surgeons, or dentists and oral surgeons, assistance should be given for establishing and improving hospitals for oral surgery.

We think that Canada should have definite symbols, not only of her British heritage, but also of the other parts of her development which include French Canadian culture and traditions. For this reason we are making proposals for a Canadian flag and a Canadian national anthem.

Progressive Conservative

Since the Model Parliament is based on federal policies, the campus Progressive Conservative club stands solidly on the record of the Conservative government in Ottawa. In the 18 months since Mr. Diefenbaker took over from a morally bankrupt Liberal administration the Conservatives have passed an unprecedented list of good education. Federal aid to education has been increased by 50 per cent. Substantial increases have been made in pensions; old age assistance, pensions for veterans, the disabled and the blind.

The Conservative government has made $650,000,000 available for small home construction loans. When the Conservatives came to power they had to face a recession. To fight it the government has cut income tax by $178,000,000. They have twice extended seasonal unemployment benefits. The Conservative government has expanded public works to combat unemployment and arranged to pay 50 per cent of municipal public works this winter.

To aid the Canadian farmer the Conservative government has sold wheat at a record rate. It has enacted cash advances on farm stored grain. It has passed legislation to prevent dumping of foreign agricultural products on the Canadian market. In addition the Conservatives have brought out a new system of support prices on agricultural products.

The Campus Progressive Conservative club believes in the basic principles of the Conservative Party. Broadly speaking these are: the emergence of Canada into a fuller nationhood both economically and politically;

The development of Canada as an "opportunity state" where each individual may develop himself as he sees fit, free from economic hardship outside his own control and free from bureaucratic interference; the use of the welfare state as a "springboard, not a sofa."

On the campus we seek to carry forward these aims and ideals. In our Model Parliament platform therefore, we propose:

Education: No qualified individual should be unable to come to university for lack of money. An extension of the bursary and scholarship system is the best way to prevent this. In last year's Model Parliament we introduced and passed a bill to this effect.

Foreign Affairs: We support NATO, the UN and the Commonwealth as the cornerstones of an independent Canadian foreign policy. We support and encourage all attempts to end the Cold War by negotiation and agreement. But we refuse to withdraw from NATO or NORAD until peace is ensured by other means.

Senate Reform: If elected we will bring in a bill to reform the Senate. We favour having one-third of the members appointed by the provinces and retiring Senators at 75 years of age.

Bill of Rights: We will bring in a Bill of Rights for Canada, to protect the individual from the state.

This is the Conservative record, ideals and platform. We think it is worthy of Canada in every way. We urge you to give it your support and on Dec. 17, vote Progressive Conservative.

experiment in psychosis

World of the Wonderful Light

By LIZ BINKS
Varsity Features Editor

Like a small but persistent stream winding through the passage of time, the mind of man has attempted to delve into the caves and labyrinths that form the unknown questions of his universe.

Not always successful, the stream has often beat against walls it cannot penetrate, and so formed into pools to stagnate and eventually dry away. But other channels have survived the twistings and have given humanity the Age of Belief, the Age of Reason, the Age of Enlightenment, the Age of Analysis.

Now, from the secrets of the exterior universe, the stream is turning inward to explore and reveal the most mysterious cave of all—the mind of man itself.

Out of this searching has been discovered some of the amazing potential of the human mind when whole—and along with it some of the terrifying facts of mental illness.

In a provincial mental hospital in Weyburn, Saskatchewan this summer, a 23-year-old interne psychologist took part in an experiment to aid science understand the vast implications of this problem.

Robert Dewar, a post graduate Psychology student at the University of Toronto swallowed 100 grams of lysergic acid diethylamide and for the following 12 hours existed in a state of temporary psychosis or schizophrenia.

The setting of the experiment was the home of the hospital superintendent. Beside Dewar, his host, another doctor and a female interne psychologist shared the experience. Here are some of the impressions he recorded after:

Within an hour of taking the serum I began to notice changes in my perception and found myself laughing for no reason. Pictures in the room which had previously held no great fascination for me took on a sudden new significance.

I am no art lover, but as I lapsed from gaiety into seriousness, the face of a man in one picture took on lifelike qualities. The eyes seemed to open and close, the facial expression changed and in a deep emotional state I saw 20 different faces in that picture within a minute.

The phonograph was playing at the time. The music (my favorites, I remember, were Gaiety Parisienne and Faust) sounded more beautiful than I had ever known it. When I closed my eyes, phrases of the music took on colors which deepened with the volume and formed patterns.

At one stage I was lying on a couch and watched my arm turn into a snake that blended beautifully with the upholstery. Strangely enough, I was not in the least frightened. It was a pleasant experience and I could only think of how pretty it was.

All the time I was aware of what was happening to me and kept experimenting with various things to see how I would react. I found I was becoming completely depersonalized—my body was no longer associated with myself and I felt no concern about it.

The experiment often exhausted me and once, when I was lying on the floor to relax, I watched quite detached as my body seemed to melt away and run over the room like spilled molasses.

These hallucinations, as they are technically called, were mostly visual and were coupled with greatly heightened perception. Every sound, every color, sight and smell were exaggerated and took on new meanings and associations.

Another amazing experience was my distorted sense of time. Two of us walked about 30 yards down to the river but felt as though we had walked for miles. The hospital whistle blew in the distance and to us it seemed 10 miles long stretching across the sky.

A cigarette seemed to take hours to smoke as more and more associations crowded into my brain.

Between the four of us taking the test there was astounding sympathy and communication, not just verbally but on the level of feeling as well. It was as if we were all on the same frequency, the same wave length and a specific feeling on the part of one of us was immediately transmitted to the others.

But all of this is secondary in importance to what I discovered about myself in relation to the universe. As if I had the truth by the tail, I was confident of having the answers for everything as the central being in the universe.

I was, as it were, at one with the cosmos exercising a superhuman power, in control of and aware of all that is important in living.

At the same time I could project myself into other objects—a fly on a table or a tree. I could even see a flower breathing.

For me, the whole experience was immensely pleasant. Because I had been told to relax and enjoy it, I did and there was no hint of the horrible in anything. I was subject throughout and after the test to a complete inner exhaustion, a relaxing of inner tensions. It was the way you feel after studying all night and writing an exam, or after emotional situations where fear or nervousness enters in.

Dewar's reactions were more fortunate than those of others who have undergone the same test.

To many people, he explained, there are too many associations for them to handle, and they become unable to concentrate, unable to distinguish what is important.

This, in an exaggerated form, is what happens to the schizophrenic who often refuses to communicate at all or to reveal the astounding intuitions he has with regard to others because he is unable to sort his associations in a coherent pattern.

Because Dewar knew what he was doing and was himself emotionally balanced enough to transcend his experience, he gleaned from it insights almost comparable to religious conversion.

For him personally, the most important revelation he had was the revelation between living and human being's relations with the universe. The "know thyself" credo was his most profound impression and close on its heels came the logical step of sharing with others this perception at the feeling level.

From a purely psychological level, the test presented an amazing problem—and a possible solution. If the physical fact of swallowing a serum can produce the symptoms of mental illness, why is schizophrenia itself not a biological disease caused by a physical condition affecting the brain and thought processes?

And accordingly, why is a biological cure not the answer to what has, for centuries, been considered a mental and spiritual condition?

These are questions which face Dewar and thousands like him as they guide science in its venture into the human mind. They do not know the answers; they can only guess. But they are on the frontiers of one of the most fascinating regions in the explorations of man.

Nfcus Urges Action In Higher Education

The National Federation of Canadian University Students has urged all Canadians to wipe out "the deplorable situation in which higher education is not accessible to all on the basis of merit."

In a statement on the 10th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Nfcus President Mortimer Bistrisky drew attention to Article 26 of the Declaration, which reads "higher education shall be equally accessible to all on the basis of merit."

"University students from coast to coast deplore the fact that in Canada there are thousands of citizens who have the merit but do not have the access to higher education", he said.

"We particularly deplore the fact that this inequality is primarily due to the continuous growing financial obstacle".

"It is a national tragedy that thousands are deprived of the right outlined in Article 26 because they were not born into families of means", Bistrisky said.

CCF Rights Statements

Campus CCF President Jerry Caplan last night emphatically denied charges that his party's platform includes Canadian withdrawal from all defence pacts such as NATO.

However, we do feel these pacts in themselves have merely become an excuse to maintain the status quo in world affairs, and that Canadian and American refusals to attempt to discover more suitable solutions to the vital problems facing us are not helping us solve daily crises," Caplan said.

He said the CCF party advocates only the disengagement of foreign troops and nuclear weapons from Central Europe, in order that Canada might withdraw military support from NATO and divert the money thus saved to such things as economic aid for underdeveloped countries.

"This latter point," he said, "provides the fundamental difference in philosophy between the CCF and the other two parties."

Blues Host Carabins Seek Elusive Victory

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

With the annual strain on international relations over with for the season, best forgotten, but never quite, Varsity Blues clash with University of Montreal Carabins at Varsity Arena tonight.

The flying Montrealers have done reasonably well in their two games to date. Losing 8-4 to Laval, Carabins trumped McGill 13-0.

Boys to watch in the blue and gold scores are Yves Laurendeau and Marcel Landreville. The two big L's have eight points each in the current scoring race.

Blues will probably start without two regulars, Mike Elik and Ron Casey are both sidelined with leg injuries garnered in the hills of Colorado. Tommy Watt and Dunc Brodie worked out last night, but aren't completely free of their limps.

The bright spot on the Varsity roster is the return to action of slarry defenseman Neil Munro.

In the event that Elik and Casey won't mend for tonight, coach Jack Kennedy has been experimenting with several line combinations.

Red Stephen has been moved up to center between Dunc Brodie and Bill Kennedy. Needless to say, the line has a tremendous amount of scoring punch. Howie Roth, Don Fleming, Grant Mills and John Macdonald are all capable of working together to form other lines.

Ray Dunn has looked particularly agile in the work-out last night, and appears to be coming around to the form that won him the all-star goalkeeper's berth last year.

With half the gold-dust combination inactive, it is probably Harry Neale will prowling the blue stripes with rugged Frank Sullivan, Lorry Stacey and Munro will also combine as a formidable duo.

Blues should be particularly hungry to win one in a row.

A victory at the Arena tonight will put them within one game of the pace setting Laval Rouge et Or.

This will be the final Intercollegiate bout of the year. Varsity meet the world-beating Whitby Dunlops at the Arena on Dec. 17.

Let's all go out to the game, you fans, you.

The University of Toronto Hockey Blues have paid their last visit to oxygen-less Colorado for a long, long time. It took two or three visits, but Varsity finally learned—the hard way.

Coach Jack Kennedy, commenting yesterday on the trip, was most emphatic in his opinion that "we won't go back next year, nor for some years to come."

What lay behind that decision? Jake supplied part of the answer, and we'll try to fill in the unpleasant balance.

"Last season, we had a pretty good team, and gained one tie in four games. This season, I'm firmly convinced we have a better team, yet we couldn't even tie a game."

"That's final proof that it's not worth the time or trouble. The altitude is simply too high to make it much more than an endurance test. We won't go back!"

That was the coach's explanation. We're going to take the liberty to supply a bit more, not only to the Colorado trip, but Varsity Blues in general, and a couple of near-fantastic pipe dreams.

When 15 players skate out on the ice in their Toronto uniforms, they represent not just a hockey team, but the good name of our university. It is their duty to uphold that name.

And it cannot be done from the penalty box, where Varsity players passed some 167 minutes in three games; or from the dressing room, which six Blues visited prematurely following eviction from the game.

Coach Kennedy read the Riot Act before the final contest on Tuesday night. He told his players to steer clear of the penalty box, and he threatened them with demotion.

Now, it's not likely there would be any radical lineup changes on the team—win, lose or draw—but laying down the law must have done some good. Varsity received nary a penalty in the final game, and played their best hockey of the trip.

"It made a real difference," Jake commented. "They finally went out with the attitude they were going to play hockey, and that's exactly what they did."

But will it last? Kennedy answered that query, too.

"The next week will tell. If we play against Montreal and Whitby the way we were starting to show on Tuesday night, I think we'll be all right."

"But if we don't, I think the team will be in for a rude awakening. I just hope the fellows can jell the way they are capable of doing. If they can't . . ."

His voice trailed off with an inward shudder at the possibility of the team that has been suggested as Canada's 1960 Olympic representatives falling apart in their own league.

But possibilities often materialize, and with the apparent power showing at Laval and University of Montreal, it just might happen. Whether it does or not, let's face it, the Varsity Blues of December 12, 1958, would be the laughing stock of Squaw Valley.

Publicity releases and propaganda scattered about the campus herald the approaching battle next Wednesday night between Whitby Dunlops, world amateur champions, and Varsity Blues, Intercollegiate champions.

In fine print on the posters, one finds a suggestion that this year's team can be compared with the Varsity Grads of 1928, who won the Olympic title in resounding fashion.

Our imagination is elastic, but it won't stretch that far — not by a long shot. That hot air rising through some local fedoras resembles Old Faithful with her "every hour on the hour."

Coach Kennedy insists that his 1958-59 team is better than any of the champion squads of the past four seasons. We've seen three of those, and we beg to disagree.

We won't call the team of 1956, for example, better than the team of 1958. We'll simply say that this year's team is not as good. Individually, they may be better, but it takes a team to win a championship.

Is this overconfidence? Coach Kennedy doesn't think so. But does he know what it is that is keeping his players back from turning into that powerhouse we have come to expect?

"It's just one of those things. We have the potential, and I think it will, in time, turn out the way it should," he suggested.

We hope it will, too, but we're wondering. Has talk of the Olympics turned a good hockey team into a group of individualists who can't, and don't care to, work with each other?

Have four consecutive easy-come championships turned the college loop into a cat-and-mouse game for the Blues? If so, the mice will play, because the cat's away on a cloud somewhere.

Tonight, Varsity faces a "must" game. A loss would drop them into severe difficulties. A win would be of great assistance to their pennant hopes.

But win, lose or draw, it has to be a solid, spirited team effort. If it's not, bye, bye, Queen's Cup.

Laval Twosome Tied For Scoring Lead

Laval's Pierre Raymond moved into a first-place tie with team-mate Claude Duguay in the Intercollegiate scoring race. Each picked up five points as Rouge et Or whipped University of Montreal, 8-4, in a league game.

Toronto's Bill Kennedy is third with eight points, one back of the leaders. Kennedy has played one game less than Duguay or Raymond.

Girls Not Active In Winter Sports

By PAM HILL
Varsity Staff Reporter

What sport do you play?—not did you play, but do you play? Ask any man on campus that, and he'll say anything from "interfacultary football and hockey" to "a bit of squash on Sundays."

But ask any co-ed, and there's a 50-50 chance you MIGHT get as much as "interfacultary baseball" (which entails all of approximately eight hours per annum!). And the number that don't do a thing far exceeds those who really work at an Intercollegiate sport.

Also, nearly every man on campus avails himself of the opportunities of Hart House. Granted, the women don't have such extensive facilities this year, but there's very little a woman can't athletically indulge in when she feels so inclined.

And you realize there's a Women's Athletic Building going up at Huron and Harbord, which will be ready for next fall. Already the men are booking time in the swimming pool, so . . . looks good! It would be nice if we had the top teams worthy of a new top-notch athletic institution.

Anyhoo, oh apathetic ones! The hockey season is just starting to roll — as well as the volleyball, and there's still time for the Intercollegiate basketball teams.

Hockey is a good "fresh-air" game, and you don't have to be a good stick-handler to be on a team. There are three hierarchical leagues, and the C-league is a real RIOT! Pharmacy has scraped up a team, so if your faculty doesn't have one, they'd be glad to have you out — call Carol Fraser at UC.

Volleyball doesn't take much energy. There's both interfaculty and intercollegiate teams, and they both need team-mates. It's a relatively new and rising sport, so support it!

So dad burn it, women! Bring your head out of the clouds, throw away the "college sophistication" take off your high heels, and "let yourself go" — Be yourself! Being part of a team is a privilege you don't fully appreciate until you get to College, and some of you are never going to realize it. Besides, athletes are more . . . darn fun than a barrel of monkeys! Competition is fun, and the training gives you all sorts of vim, vigour and vitality.

See you on the rink! Whumph!

Mustang Swimmers Here In Championship Preview

Intercollegiate exhibition swimming grabs the Hart House athletic spotlight tonight as University of Western Ontario Mustangs move in for a meet with Bill Yorzkyk's defending champion Blues.

A preview of the regular Intercollegiate meet to be held at McGill February 28, tonight's fray promises to be one of the best of the season.

Blues, fresh from a 67-21 win over Buffalo State late week-end, and a fine individual showing in Hamilton's Winter Carnival, will have a tough job holding the visiting UWO crew in check.

Leading the Mustang parade is freestyler Denes Szvetko, Intercollegiate defending champion, and Pan-American Games contestant Peter Bell, who set a record winning the 200-yard breast stroke event in last year's meet.

Also swimming with Western will be freestyle ace Larry Freeman, who toiled in a Varsity suit for two years before encountering academic difficulties and transferring to Western last September.

Blues, on the other hand, will counter with a strong lineup of veterans, bolstered with a few newcomers that are filling well the gaps created by graduates last season.

Walt Unger, who finished fourth in the 100-yard freestyle and second in the 50-yard freestyle last year, has been singled out by Yorzkyk as one of the most improved competitors on the team.

Newcomers Bob Fisher and diver Bill Sims have brought considerable relief to Yorzkyk. Fisher, a versatile aquaman from Lawrence Park Collegiate Institute, was Toronto's top interscholastic swimmer last season, while Sims, a graduate of St. Catharines' Ridley College, has established himself as Blues' No. 2 diver behind a much-improved Dave Harvey.

Tonight's meet gets underway at 8 o'clock.

Campus Parties In Flurry Facing Election Tomorrow — A Climax: — Crowe Rehired

The three campus political parties will end a feverish campaign tonight, and await the decision of voters in tomorrow's Model Parliament election.

Parliament chairman Sue Davis said the parliament is receiving "the biggest and most enthusiastic support in its history". Authorities hope the number of voters will break the 3,000 mark for an all-time record.

Last minute additions to the Progressive Conservative platform include acts to restrain corrupt union practices by providing that unions may be sued in court, that unions shall publish annual audited financial reports, that union elections shall be by secret ballot and that no union member shall be compelled to contribute to any political party.

Other portions of the Tory platform include an extension of the bursary and scholarship system, a refusal to withdraw from NATO or NORAD until peace is assured by other means, a reform of the Senate with one third of the members appointed by the provinces, and a Bill of Rights for Canada.

Another late campaign development was an accusation by CCF president Jerry Caplan that "the fact the Liberals and Conservatives are attacking us so bitterly proves that they are afraid of our policies."

The CCF platform includes banning of nuclear tests, a policy of progressive disarmament, the establishment of a neutralized zone in central Europe, the withdrawal of Canada from such military regional alliances as NATO and the Warsaw Pact, the establishment of a permanent international police force under the UN, and greater emphasis on economic aid, all in their foreign policy.

In their domestic policy the CCF party recommends that university fees be abolished, that unemployment be prevented by low-rental homes, a complete national health plan, better highways and other provisions, and the support of certain Canadian cultural organizations by public funds.

The Liberal platform contains planks that approval be given for immediate production of the CF-105 Avro Arrow, that "Oh Canada" be designated as Canada's official national anthem, that Canada adopt a distinctive Canadian flag, that Canada institute negotiations for the formation of a North Atlantic economic community, that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be allowed to broadcast House of Commons' debates, that aid be given to oral surgical institutions, that a Teacher's College be established in Northern Ontario, and that an education program be introduced that will ensure a qualified teacher in every Ontario classroom.

WINNIPEG — CUP — Professor Harry S. Crowe was reinstated at United College yesterday.

Reasons for the reinstatement were not revealed by the Board of Regents which made the announcement. The controversy has seen the resignation of the college principal and 15 other professors.

Prof. Crowe was dismissed in September after a letter he had written to another professor, Dr. W. A. Packer, came into the hands of the principal, Dr. Wilfred Lockhart, formerly minister of Kingsway-Lambton United Church in Etobicoke. Contents of the letter have never been revealed.

Trade Minister Churchill, one member of the Board of Regents, is thought to have played a major role in the reinstatement. The text of a memorandum given Mr. Churchill by Prof. Crowe stated that he was anxious to terminate the public criticism regarding the case and help restore the academic confidence in the college.

The statement released by the university read:

"On behalf of the Board of Regents, Allan H. Watson, board chairman, announces that Prof. Harry S. Crowe will resume duties as associate professor at United College immediately.

"The board hopes all concerned will now unite in an effort to enable United College to continue to occupy its rightful place in the academic world."

It was rumored that the University of Manitoba, with which the college is affiliated, was ready to ask the Senate to sever connections with the college. This is thought to have been one of the factors influencing yesterday's decision.

Former principal Dr. Lockhart has repeated that his resignation still stands, although it has not been accepted by the board.

News Snaps

Parliament in the Classroom

Model Parliament campaigning hit the classroom yesterday when philosophy professor Marcus Long took time out to comment on the CCF poster.

The poster depicts the comic-strip character Schroeder of "Peanuts" and friend Charlie Brown. The caption reads: "Beethoven would have voted CCF."

Commented Prof. Long: "That's obvious — Beethoven was stone deaf and couldn't listen to reason."

HHOA Loses Leader

"The Hart House Associates has accepted the resignation of Elmo Ciprietti (III SMC) as chairman of the organization with 'unanimous regret.'"

John Rung (I SMC) was chosen by acclamation to replace Ciprietti who tendered his resignation after "a careful consideration" of his academic status.

Rung takes leadership of the body at a bad time. Needed are 150 ticket buyers for the next three concerts if the body is to end the year in the black.

Things are Bad Here

The Christmas spirit has not yet pervaded all hearts.

Sunday night, a World University Service scholar, Mohammed Dokainish, lost his brand-new overcoat, scarf, gloves and wallet while eating in a Bloor St. restaurant.

Mohammed is reported to have observed that things like this didn't happen in Egypt.

Share Fails

The Share campaign is officially over—but late returns and private contributions will be accepted in the Students' Administrative Council office all this week.

Grand campaign total is $3,604, although some returns are still incomplete.

Biggest surprise of today's totals is a $150 contribution from the Engineering Faculty. Skulemen hoped to collect at least $800 to finance a year's studies at U of T for a foreign scholar.

Returns generally were far below the $13,000 objective, and even missed the $5,000 figure Share officials pinned their hopes on.

"Perhaps it was the time of year," campaign co-chairman Sue Evans said last night. "I feel the canvassers did a tremendous job. People just didn't give enough."

Only Wythlife College managed to break the 100 percent barrier. Next in line for honors were Trinity and Emmanuel with 68 percent each.

The Ontario College of Education plans to have its Share campaign in January. OCE students have been in the middle of exams for the past two weeks.

Best Wishes

The Varsity, with infinite regret, once more suspends publication for the Christmas holidays.

With 52 issues behind us, and 31 to come in the spring term, the editor and staff take this opportunity to wish every one of the 13,000 alleged students in this university and to the staff, a very merry Christmas (just another SAC service).

Revise Epstein Rules

A new revision of Epstein literary award rules has extended prize-winning chances for former winners.

University College's Epstein committee "has decided that competitors who have already won a major prize may be given substantial prizes in the same field," Committee chairman N. J. Endicott announced last night.

Former competition winners can now be awarded up to $150 in the same division in future years, he said. Old regulations ruled out further competition in the same division for major winners.

Competition is still limited to University College undergraduates. Deadline for this year's contest is Jan. 5, and entries should be submitted to the UC registrar's office.

Carleton Has Dress Problems Council Motions All Defeated

OTTAWA — CUP — The thorny perennial problem of student dress has been thrashed about here once more.

Carleton University's student council defeated a motion to set standards of student dress on the campus. Five motions went down to defeat on the subject of student dress and what should or could be done about it.

Student councillors first moved, to give the responsibility for such a decision to the administration. Then they tried to take a stand demanding proper dress under a special council edict.

All motions were defeated, and a final effort was made through proposing a campus-wide referendum. This too went down to defeat.

The move to standardize student dress has been tried on several Canadian campuses, but has rarely worked. Earlier this fall U of T's Engineering dean asked students not to wear SPS jackets, but some engineers rebelled and the dean said it was only a "suggestion."

Toronto Debaters Upset In U.S. — Will Make TV IN '59

The University of Toronto Debating Union is going to be seen coast to coast early next year.

The national network of the CBC plans to telecast a January debate between the UTDU and McGill University debaters on the motion "Resolved that there is a new case for pacifism".

The debate takes place at 3 p.m. in the Victoria College Alumni Hall and will last for one-half hour. After being on "Citizen's Forum" the show will be broadcast over the CBC radio network on a 45-minute program.

Toronto high schools will be sending representatives to sit in on the debate. The network is hoping for considerable participation from the floor.

The debating union last week took part in a debate at the University of Pittsburgh for the eleventh annual Cross-Examination Tournament.

Debaters Bernard Raxlen (U

Pre-Med) and Richard Ten (SMC) were forced at the last minute to debate for the affirmative after preparing for the negative on the topic "Resolved that further development of nuclear weapons should be prohibited by international agreement".

An American team won the competition in which 50 universities took part, including four from Canada. Raxlen said most judges reacted favorably to the Canadian versatility.

The American debaters use a file-card system, said Raxlen. Debates consist of statements made by experts in the field. This system was rendered useless by the Toronto system of presentation, Raxlen said.

Canadian team members were greatly impressed by the coaching system used in the States. Each team is carefully prepared beforehand by an expert, Raxlen said.

"We have debaters here of high calibre," Tan said, "and with proper coaching there is no reason why we cannot have a first-rate team."

FROS Makes Holiday Plans

The Toronto Committee for Friendly Relations with Overseas Students has big plans for U of T foreign students over the Christmas vacation.

FROS plans an "open house" at their headquarters, 3 Willcocks St., Dec. 19. Their Christmas party will be held between 5-10 p.m. Dec. 28 at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Frazer Deacon. All foreign students are welcome.

The Varsity Christian Fellowship has arranged a holiday at Cherry Hill Farm from Dec. 23 to Dec. 27. "There will be a Danish Christmas Eve, and a traditional Canadian Christmas Day dinner", a V.C.F. spokesman said. Informal evenings around the fireplace will be spent seeing slides of other countries.

learning folk songs, and hearing of different national customs.

An "egg nog party" Dec. 24 and a supper-dance on Boxing Day feature among the Canterbury Centre plans for overseas students. It has also arranged for a substantial number of them to be entertained by members of local parish churches on Christmas Day.

Other arrangements negotiated through F.R.O.S. include parties in national style for West Indian, Chinese, and Indian students in Toronto.

CCF Boss To Speak

A distinguished member of the CCF party will give an address on campus today as part of the U of T CCF Club's campaign for election to Model Parliament.

Mr. David Lewis, National Chairman of the CCF, who is in close contact with union and Socialist leaders throughout Europe and the Commonwealth, will speak on "Does Canada Need a Socialist Party?"

Jerry Caplan, campus CCF president said last night, "Today many people claim because of more social equality and fewer class distinctions, Socialism has lost the claim to existence it had in depression days."

"We in the CCF cannot agree with this criticism and we believe Mr. Lewis' speech will be based on the reasons for our opinion."

Mr. Lewis, a former Rhodes scholar and member of the bar, has been active in the CCF since 1936.

The meeting is at 4:15 in room 11, University College.

Christmas and what it means has been hashed over by the pulpit, the platform or the press for more than nineteen hundred years.

Priests have prayed about it, poets played with it, composers have glorified it, Tin Pan Alley cheapened it, editors have eulogized over it, novelists shaped immortal characters connected with it, theologians have theorized about it and reformists deplored its secularization longer than there has been a Santa Claus.

Christmas remains an intensely personal experience and each individual has his own understanding of it.

We, with the ages heavy upon us, have neither the artistic ability nor the desire to universalize this experience or transcend the particular understanding.

Rather than vulgarize the intrinsically inexpressable, we simply wish you all:

Merry Christmas.

everglib

A well-known University College philosophy professor yesterday paused mid-way through his panoramic version of the History of Philosophy to quip about party politics.

The professor was commenting on the CCF campaign poster which depicts Schroeder of "Peanuts" fame proclaiming that "Beethoven would have voted CCF". The professor agreed with Schroeder.

"Of course Beethoven would have voted CCF," he is reported saying. "Beethoven was stone deaf and couldn't listen to reason."

Now this may be perfectly valid, and it seems to achieve the dual purpose of putting Beethoven and the CCF in their places.

But the funny thing about Beethoven is that, even if he couldn't listen to reason, he had enough sense to stick to his own profession and by doing that he gave us reason to listen.

This unfortunately, cannot always be said of liberal philosophers who frequently forget about the small "I".

evergloat

Along about Christmas various faculties usually mount some sort of seasonal decoration outside their buildings.

The decorations take different forms, and all involve time, energy and money. Arts colleges seem to favor creches or chapel lighting effects.

The engineers have a no less valid symbol—a huge Christmas tree.

The Engineering Society has some misgivings about erecting a tree this year. Three years ago their tree was pulled down. Two years ago they sank the tree in three feet of cement, but this was quickly overcome by a saw.

This year the society is not only embedding the base in cement, but they are also drilling out the trunk and inserting a steel rod.

Of course, some energetic idiot with a good hack-saw can destroy anything. But there doesn't seem to be much point.

Nobody thinks it's very inspiring to pull down the St. Mike's creche or break the windows in Trinity College chapel. By the same token there should be a minimum of moral satisfaction derived from pulling down the SPS Christmas tree.

Not only would the culprits be liable for severe prosecution, but they would be underlining vividly the unthinking stupidity and wanton exhibitionism which has replaced the traditional but responsible attitude towards "student pranks".

Not only does the modern student seek glory by hurting somebody else, but events this term have shown that he must further enhance his ego by boasting about it afterwards.

Scattered through this issue are memories of one short term of a university career.

It was a good term as terms go: exciting if you take your excitement in modest doses and can add a dash of your own imagination; dull if you like excitement neat and unadulterated.

There was no Hungary to inspire our young crusading hearts; no Suez to provoke our young, opinionated minds. Sputniks have become a thing of the past, a novelty which has faded into insignificance. Shots at the moon are prosaic.

University news was the brightest it's ever been: La Rotunde and the Ottawa story, the case of Harry Crowe, Duplessis and the Quebec universities, the President's committee on student aid, and others of varying degrees of importance.

The Varsity this term has tried—and with one marital lapse, I think succeeded—in carrying on a professional tradition begun three years ago: the policy of keeping the paper out of the paper.

There have been a minimum number of stories on staffers and no pictures of the office to fill up odd holes.

But here I want to talk about what we have done and will do in the future.

Things we have concentrated on, partly because they were news and partly because I feel that way are education and national university events.

One education series, edited by Sam Azjenstat, dealing with the various stages of the provincial education program, made a few suggestions and several criticisms.

Later the Bissell plan turned the spotlight on Education, again and finally the Frisch report, complete with graphs, made it clear just how serious the situation was.

Footprints In The Sand

Off campus it was a great term for principles. In Quebec and at the University of Ottawa the principles were at first confused. An early Varsity feature by John Gray clarified much of the background and gave Toronto students an insight into what was at stake and what had been achieved.

But Ontario's University of Ottawa and not Duplessis' Quebec became the main source of Canadian University Press news. The full La Rotunde story, which we gave you as it happened, came through a Varsity contact at U of O who stood, still stands, to lose his university career if his name were revealed to authorities.

Principle, this time between staff and authorities, was also prominent in the Harry Crowe affair. Its settlement today comes after one of the bitterest academic disputes in the history of education in this country.

There are still hot points of interest in Canadian universities. Quebec is still an open question; the University of British Columbia seems to be carrying on its personal battle with the provincial government, but the issues there have still to be clarified.

And this, unless we all get tired of lonely nights and celibacy, we will endeavor to do next term.

All these high points have floated upon the broad and firm base of The Varsity as a newspaper. The base is made possible by one of the most solid, hard-working and inspired a staff an editor has been fortunate enough to work under.

Meanwhile, if you don't agree with what we are doing, you, the students who own the paper, have a duty to tell us. After all, you have nothing to lose but our fun.

A Roundup: the Term in Review

In A Fast Term, Crowded Events

the tuition plan... An Explosion

By HARVEY SHEPHERD
Varsity News Editor

The 1958 Michémas term at the U of T began with a new bookstore adorning the campus and a Women's Athletic Building, a Victoria College Women's Residence and a new Dental Building abuilding.

On-Dec. 9 the U of T took official cognizance of the fact that the bookstore was open. And a lot of water passed under the bridge in the interim.

At St. Michael's College, controversy over a new 11 p.m. curfew in the men's residence blew up and calmed down just in time to see a feud flare up between the two men's debating organizations which finally petered out in compromise and abeyance.

The U of T Quarterly hit the public with a series of Russian-written articles on Russian education, provoked charges of propaganda from the direction of the Slavic Studies Department and sold like wildfire.

U of T's new President Claude T. Bissell was installed Oct. 27 and promised to blend the U of T's past with its future.

Meanwhile, the future here, as everywhere else, seemed in a little more of a hurry to displace the past than it has been since the days of Sigmund Freud.

And as Dr. Norman Emerson of the U of T Anthropology department studied a new find of Indian bones at Bradford rhyolite Father Terry preached life everlasting at Trinity.

Gratien Gelinas and Charles de Gaulle found they couldn't make it to the University College Follies. Unlike de Gaulle, gowns found they weren't even wanted at UC, but UC students, after due deliberation, decided that their student executive was.

The St. Mike's Gryphon spent the term in the doldrums of non-existence, while plans proceeded for the U of T's first all-campus literary magazine, styled, of all things, Jargon.

The United Appeal and Share campaigns both fell short of ambitious objectives while Hart House Orchestra Association subscription sales finally, somehow, managed to keep the concert series in existence.

University College English professor Robin Harris and Athletic Association accountant K. S. Gregory copped Toronto education trusteeships while Jim (Sane Sunday) Karfilis failed in a Board of Control bid in spite of sporadic student backing.

It also snowed rather heavily.

Nationwide—

Fight For Rights

As 1958 ends, the year seems more than anything else to have been a struggle for rights and recognition in Canadian universities.

The greatest single struggle has been in the province of Quebec, where 22,000 students campaigned for nearly a year. They wanted Premier Maurice Duplessis to realize the sad financial plight of the universities and the students, and they wanted action.

Across Canada last spring a giant campaign was organized to ask federal and provincial governments for further aid to education. Organized by the National Federation of Canadian University Students, the plan drew some recognition when regional heads presented a special NfCUS brief to various governments.

Both the above struggles seem doomed to fail in the majority of their aims.

Premier Duplessis refused to meet Quebec students for months, sparking a one-day boycott of classes last spring. These "ill-mannered children" just wanted free education, he said.

He met with a self-appointed group representing about 80 of the province's students, but promised next to nothing. He finally met the elected student presidents earlier this month, and promised them just a little more than next to nothing.

Nothing definite has come from any of the provincial governments or the federal government after the NfCUS brief. This may change with a change of government, if and when.

At the University of Ottawa two student editors decided they had the right to ask that students control their own university activities without the ever-present hand of the university administration. The administrators decided such rights did not exist. The two were expelled.

This fall three U of O student editors decided they had the right to publish the facts of the previous firings. They too were wrong. They were fired, but not expelled.

At tiny United College in Manitoba last summer, Professor Harry Crowe decided he had the right to write a letter to a colleague. He was wrong.

The letter was intercepted by "someone" and given to the principal of the college who decided he had the right to fire Harry Crowe. The principal did have the right, and Harry Crowe no longer has a job.

However, there was one story with the sweet smell of success to it for a short time. A small skunk, striving for the right to education, was put into Carleton University by pranksters.

But when the professors arrived Monday morning, the little fellow was past his intellectual prime. He was very very dead.

ion and provincial governments be held and —that study be given to the question of whether the University term should be lengthened.

This last was suggested only in the preamble. Nevertheless, of all the report's proposals, the school-term issue provoked the widest student antipathy.

Most U of T students seemed to think, erroneously, that the Advisory Committee had flatly said university terms should be lengthened — and they complained loudly.

Complaining about the term-length suggestion were 165 U of T students in a Varsity straw poll, while 80 objected to the amount of aid given to first-class students at the expense of third-class.

But only 220 students participated in the poll. Vince Kelly,

Students' Administrative Council president pooh-poohed the poll, saying it was based on a small and unbalanced segment of the student body.

University presidents across Canada generally praised the plan with varying degrees of reservation, while student groups and left-wingers called for across-the-board aid to all university students.

SAC president Kelly set the works in motion for a study of the report by a select group of students as the National Federation of Canadian University Students forwarded Advisory Committee Report copies to prominent students across the nation.

U of T officials are unanimous in saying the report is still in the consideration and discussion stage. And it seems to be getting some pretty fierce kicking around.

For Stunters A Good Term

By VICKY INNES
Varsity Staff Reporter

A university Fall term is, almost by definition, a time of student pranks, hi-jinks, contrasting with the more serious spring term when approaching examinations are the all-important factor.

This fall has been no exception. Freshmen took part in the usual initiation rites and kidnappings occupied their share of the news during September.

Reveling students turned the train ride to Montreal into a near bedlam when they used up their excess energy in fist fights en route to the annual Montreal-Varsity football weekend.

Close to eight organizations have mysteriously come into being since the first week in October.

The Blinded Dog Society was the first. The underground organization spirited seven campus leaders to an unknown destination to raise money for the annual United Appeal campaign.

The following 10 days were relatively quiet as students turned their energies to the Homecoming football weekend. The faculties of Law, Engineering and Medicine captured prizes for their interpretations of the theme "Angularity".

Queens University runners arrived for the game panting from their 167-mile sprint from Kingston to Toronto. "Quarathon" runners arrived with a flaming torch, overcoming threats from police, rain and kidnappers.

A counterpart of the Blinded Dogs went into action in mid-October. In an anonymous note, they claimed to have stolen plaques from five fraternities, one of which was non-existent.

Confused students speculated that members of Beta Sigma Rho were masquerading since both fraternity and the Big Seven Renegades have the same initials.

By the end of the week an estimated $100 had been stolen, mostly in the form of frat plaques.

Later on, a pseudo-BSR gang took a painting from St. Hilda's College, demanding $10 for its return.

Meanwhile, members of Sigma Chi threatened police action and other fraternities voiced strong disapproval of the increasing number of pranks.

Novel publicity stunts drew mixed comments from the undergraduate body. Members of University College Follies sent telegrams to Premier de Gaulle and Gratien G. Galina, inviting them to patronize the Follies. Three others went on a hunger strike, wore white togas and read books on Zen Buddhism to persuade students to buy tickets.

The "Myopic Puppy Fellowship" contributed six chickens to Engineers and yet another group, the "Group of Five" broke into the news when its Dundas street meeting was broken up by police for disorderly conduct.

Plans of the Students' Action League for a Sane Sunday, which included an hour-long demonstration in Queen's Park fell flat when bad weather allowed only 40 students to show up.

Student apathy was blasted several times throughout the term, notably in connection with charity drives. The Share and United Appeal campaigns both fell short of their goals.

The theft of the 250-pound Engineering Society safe in December had the distinction of being the most serious offence. The safe, containing books and $1,300 in cash and cheques, was found 36 hours later decorated with signs saying "Merry Christmas" and "Zorro".

But Metropolitan Toronto's Police Department warned that pranksters would be severely treated when found. So far they haven't been.

Bissell advises frosh: Campus is Angular

A little-known word, buried in the middle of a traditional speech, snowballed this fall into the most quoted cliché U of T has ever known.

President Claude T. Bissell introduced the term in his opening-day address to the undergraduates in Convocation Hall. He cautioned his audience to beware of becoming "well-adjusted" and urged them instead to become "angular".

The word soon became the focal point for criticism of the administration. SPS Dean R. R. McLaughlin was accused of being "unangular": when he asked the engineers to conform to set standards of dress, Ian Macdonald, US's Dean of Men, got in the picture when he expelled an "angular type" from residence.

Angularity served as theme for faculty dances and parties. It was the key-note of the annual homecoming weekend float parade.

The term inspired innumerable cartoons and campus jokes, and even one song:

"Angularity forever,
Angularity forever.
Angularity forever.
For Bissell makes us strong."

SAC At A Glance

Students' Administrative Council this fall, while holding six meetings:

—Debated for two hours without any concrete results over a motion charging administrations of the universities of Ottawa and Montreal with "infringing of academic freedom and freedom of the press" in the firing of student editors, and then abruptly ratified the motion came after a coffee break.

—came close to refusing permission for a spectator to speak from the floor, —approved of an original bookshow for the AVR, with a formal opening night, black-tie style and an $11 profit, —acted as official custodian of the U of T crest in ordering Ronald Raisman (IV UC) to stop selling decal car-window stickers with the crest on them, heard a plea from Raisman in a later meeting, and upheld their decision, —approved an all-campus literary magazine and appointed John Robert Colombo as editor, —and defeated a motion appropriating $2,500 for furnishing the SAC President's office and a council lounge.

some new parties — — some old ones

A Review Of Campus Politics

The campus political scene this fall spotlighted repeated attempts to form a fourth party.

Founders of the first "new party" protested against the "present inane and dogmatic state" of university politics. The movement never received a name.

Early in October plans were revealed for the formation of a Social Revisionist party. The movement was touted as a reaction against existing political parties and the "flat-footed seriousness" with which they regard their "tinsel triumphs."

Two days later the existence of a "non-political group with political aims" was disclosed. Called the Monarchist Movement of North America, its aim was "to promote the monarchy as an institution of government."

None of the new parties was allowed to participate in the Model Parliament elections. The Debating Union in charge of the Parliament announced in October that no new parties would be recognized unless they could prove serious political aims.

Students showed their nascent interest in politics in other, less constructive, doings.

An abortive attempt to overthrow the government of the Trinity College Literary Institute on a vote of non-confidence was shot down as 31 of the 40 members present indicated they liked the incumbent administration.

In Wycliffe College, students succeeded in overthrowing three student governments within the space of a week. In quick succession student governments, responsible for decisions on all student matters, including finances, were set up and knocked down.

On Monday a bare quorum overthrew the Anti-Clerical party, on Tuesday the Elizabethan Party Continued was given the gate and on Thursday a third government resigned before a vote of want-of-confidence could be introduced.

With no precedent for such a development, Governor-General Charles Ledger called a general election, and two new parties took their platforms to the electorate. The Theocratic party downed the favoured Confederates and Wycliffe subsided into its more normal political somnolence.

Members of the recognized campus political clubs heard speakers from both federal and provincial parliaments through the term.

Tories listened to York-Scarborough MP Frank McGee support John Foster Dulles, United States Secretary of State, in his policy regarding recognition of China's Communist government.

CCFers heard their federal leader Hazen Argue blast Prime Minister John Diefenbaker for having failed to carry out his campaign promises. Campus Tories gave vehement denial to the accusations.

The Liberal party heard Opposition leader Lester Pearson attack the Conservative government for following an economic policy leading to "galloping inflation."

A round of inter-party accusations and challenges brought on a mild two-party debate on the Frost government early in November. The CCF was excluded from the debate on the grounds that a tri-party wrangle would be unwieldy.

Announcement of an advanced date for January's Model Parliament last week brought all three parties back to the serious business of campaigning for campus votes to be cast tomorrow.

A Beautiful Book, Lavishly Illustrated

The Face of Early Canada

By F. ST. GEORGE SPENDLOVE

Royal Ontario Museum

This handsome book is a collection of early Canadian prints, together with the story of the artists, engravers and publishers.

The pictorial documentation of Canadian history before the introduction of photography was largely due to the British officer in Canada. English officers were taught to sketch as part of their training at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, and many of them kept it up as a hobby. This became our greatest source of information.

An ideal gift for historian, collector, connoisseur and for everyone who values a beautiful book.

Cat Goes Shopping

The over-rushed student, burdened down with late essays and term tests, may find he has little time to go far afield for his Christmas shopping. In the interests of all such students on the U of T campus, Campus Cat this year performs another SAC service by offering the following sage advice:

Go West, young shopper, to the spanking, brand-new book store, ignore the architectural effects and dig those crazy bargains.

For the Art Lover: A set of six watercolors, specially commissioned from Canadian artist Nicholas Hornyansky by the University of Toronto Bookstore. Paintings depict familiar university scenes, sell for $1.50 without frame, $2.95 with.

—The first portfolio of Canadian drawings from the National Gallery of Canada. Folder contains Head of a Girl by F. H. Varley, Wood Interior by Emily Carr, Gattineau Landscape by Goodridge Roberts and Habitat and Snow-Shoer by William Raphael. At $1.00, it's a good buy.

For the Music Lover: Special but limited store of classical records going at wholesale prices. Stock includes six 12" with 10" commentary of Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D Major; Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 3; Mozart, Symphony No. 35 in D Major; Schumann, Symphony No. 2 in C Major; Stravinsky, Firebird Suite.

—Hart House Glee Club is still pushing its university songs, a perennial favourite along with a new Christmas carol record of well and lesser known. First is priced at $1.39; second at $3.50.

For the "Things" Lover: Chess sets at $5.95, $4.95 and handy-dandy portables for $1.95.

—University crests are plentiful. They have them on copper bookends, coasters, handsome sized trays and steins. In the China line are more ash trays, small mugs, plates and a gargantuan brown beer mug with gold embossed crest.

—Also university diploma cases, albums, pens, pencils and wooden wall plaques for $5.

Lines for an Anti-Christmas Card

Through the streets the night, riddled
With tinsel stars, proclaims in gaudy terms
The imminent innocent godhead.

And streetcorner santas, O how the Holiday kids love you, jingling your cowbell
In tune with the everlasting hymns horned
From storefronts their sound falling
Dead on galoshes and pavement.

Alcoholized eyes, thousands of signs peer through
The confetti-happy snow
Glowing with a personal christmas greeting
From the heart-felt management.

Christmas echoing off walls and neons
And reverberating into nothingness.

JOHN ROBERT COLOMBO:

The Merry Gentlemen

The Christmas spirit, echoes across the campus with the ancient custom of carolling.

Last Friday night about 200 students joined the Varsity Christian Fellowship in an all-campus carol-sing, visiting all campus residences.

At the final stop, the group crowded quietly into the main hall of the Library, and sang "Silent Night."

Some of their audience glared, and shoved their noses deeper into their books. Some got up and joined in the singing. Others just sat and listened.

By SALLY BAMBRIDGE
Varsity Staff Reporter

The carollers adjourned to the Great Hall for a Christmas musical program. Canon Leslie Hunt spoke on "The Meaning of Christmas".

On Thursday the club roamed the corridors and stopped in the rooms to the Sick Children's Hospital.

They sang carols in their usual fine manner, and talked with the delighted children. "The singing brightened their day, and the visit brightened ours," a member said. Last night they sang this issue to press.

The Glee Club will sing selections from their record at the Hart House Christmas Tree on Thursday night. To top off a busy Christmas season, they will sing carols on the CBC National network radio at 10 p.m. Christmas night.

Not to be outdone, a group from Meds will serenade all the collegers during lectures on Thursday and Friday morning. God rest you merry, gentlemen.

State of the SAC

In the first term of this year, the SAC, despite the lack of adequate finances and facilities has continued and managed to expand slightly its services and activities for the student body.

In the forthcoming year the council has planned the following activities: the Winter Carnival, the All Varsity Revue, the UTDU Tournament, the WUS Seminar, the U of T Orchestra and Chorus concerts and the Graduation Ball. At the same time the council will continue its discussion of the expansion program, the proposed SAC constitution, the honor-award system, and the Ross report.

At this time the SAC would like to thank you for the opportunity of serving you and extends to you the best wishes for the holiday season.

homecoming

By MARK NICHOLS

When Kelly came off the train, walked through the crowded cavern of Union Station and came finally into the street, it was still snowing and it was cold. The porter who had carried her suitcase stood anxiously beside her and they both looked at the crowds hurrying past and wondered who had not come to greet her. She liked the worried expression on the little negro's face; she could feel he thought there should be some one there to greet her on Christmas Eve.

But there wasn't. After he had gone, she stood watching the headlight glare of taxis curving through the mist of snow and tried to decide where to look for her father. The cab driver was a stubby man with a red face she could see watching her in the mirror as they went with stops and starts through the city lit with strings of red and green lights. He sang all the way in a sleepy voice, making "White Christmas" sound like something dirty, and she saw his name, Patrick Flodden, printed on the back of the seat. The name was echoing tediously in her head when they got to the hotel.

Kelly and the desk clerk exchanged weary sneers and she made her way up the red-carpeted stairs to her father's room. She listened at the door, heard nothing except, perhaps, the sound of breathing, and knocked.

George Lambton was stuffing his shirt tail into his pants when he opened the door. A heavenly grin lighted his sagging-alcoholic's face. "Kelly, my God," he cried, "Good God, this is awful, I'd forgotten completely, look here."

he embraced her, hands trembling as they barely touched the shoulders of her coat. She could smell the whiskey on his breath as his mouth brushed her cheek and melting snow fell from her hair to his dirty collar. But she was terribly glad to see him and remembered how she loved him.

George Lambton sat on the edge of his bed and looked nervously about. "Listen," he said, "we'd better have a drink, to celebrate." He looked around, found the bottle and poured some into a glass, then looked around again. "Only one glass, so we'll have to share." Kelly shook her head when he extended the drink and watched him gulp, then sit back staring at the remaining liquid.

"How are you?" he asked.
"All right."

"How's Montreal?"
"Same as here, it's cold. But it's all right." She smiled at her father.

"How's school? Work going all right? How are your friends? Tell me what you've been doing."

She thought for a moment. The grubby little room seemed very small and very quiet. While her father waited for her to answer, Kelly tried to hear the sounds of the street below.

"Well, I haven't been doing very much." She shrugged. "I study, go to movies, see a play now and then. Not much."

"What about the boy? Alec. Still going around with him?"

"That was in the fall," Kelly said.
"All over now?" her father asked.

"Pretty well." There was a long silence. George Lambton filled his glass again, sat twirling the whiskey as though it were brandy and stared into the dirty glass. Kelly tried to think of something to fill the silence with. She couldn't even hear the sounds in the street below.

"We had a wonderful time about a week ago," she said at length. "Five or six of us spent the day sketching around the city and had a party in the evening. In the morning we were still up, so we all went out to a Catholic church. It was very strange."

"Went to mass in the morning, did you? Yes, I remember when we were kids at college, we used to do that too."

"Then you know what I mean."

"Yeah, Well, don't let it suck you in, Kelly, it's a lot of baloney. Religion, I mean. When I was a kid for a long time I thought it was beautiful. That is, I didn't believe any of it. None of us did in those days. We were all too damn smart. Then after a while, I thought, hell, if it's so beautiful maybe it's true too. But listen, Kelly," George Lambton sat forward earnestly and Kelly noticed how glassy his eyes were, that they didn't seem to focus right, but stared askew from his puffed face, "it's just another of the tricks life plays on you. Religion is one of the shams, one of the decoys, like the red plastic seat covers they put in cars that look like leather. Well, it all wears off pretty soon. And if you believed the plastic was leather in the first place, it's a hell of a lot harder to ever believe it wasn't."

"I suppose so," Kelly looked in her coat pocket for a cigarette.

George Lambton leaned back against the pillow, let the glass sit on the table and stared at the cracked plaster of the ceiling.

"But it is beautiful," he said. "I remember how beautiful it was. Everything was beautiful for a while. God knows where it all goes suddenly." He leaned over the bed, poured another shot of whiskey. "But it sure as hell does go."

Kelly saw the bottle was empty now and wondered if there was another one in the room somewhere. Probably not, she thought. Her father lay now in a sort of dream-state and she knew all the memories of his life were passing through the confusion of his mind. For a while, she let some memories of her own float through her mind as she watched him. Among other things, she remembered when he had not drank as often or as much, and the inevitable, sentimental things she disliked came back. Like walks through the park on fall days, her father reading for hours aloud from a book of poetry, trips they had taken before her mother died and all the strange wonder of the old world there had been when George Lambton believed in it and saw it as a poet. But that was before the world she lived in had suddenly turned turtle—not at one particular moment, or in a particular period of time, but over some vague expanse of years when she had not noticed anything until the day she realized two things: that something like rot was eating her father, and that she had grown up enough to notice it.

"Father?" Perhaps he had gone to sleep. She couldn't tell. For all the silence of the room, he might have been dead.

Kelly went to the window and looked out. In the street crowds were shoving back and forth, behind store windows she could see faces worried and here and there someone laughing soundlessly over Christmas preparations.

One day, perhaps three years before, Kelly remembered talking to her father after he had lost his job as drama critic. At the time he had given up all hope of ever writing anything and was making a little money writing advertising copy. And he was drinking a lot.

"There's a choice you have to make, Kelly," he had told her. "You can sit on the beach where it is hot and warm and work with the poets mending old ideas on the bottoms of upturned boats. Or you can settle for second-best and spin your come-on yarns and do your bit for the material world. You can watch what you're doing take effect."

So George Lambton went on writing ad copy and drinking more and more. At length he forgot his wounds, forgot Kelly's mother and even forgot Kelly so long as she was at school in Montreal. The poet, forced into a mold, did an adequate job manufacturing lies about cars and washing machines and spent the rest of his time viewing a tired world where nothing was genuine and the appropriate comment on everything was a sneer; for it was the only proof of independence left.

"Are you asleep, father?"

George Lambton pulled himself into a sitting position and almost smiled. "Not asleep, just thinking." He looked at the empty bottle and drained his glass. "We'd better go somewhere. No point in sitting around here. Hell, it's Christmas Eve. We should be celebrating."

Kelly laughed. "All right. Let's celebrate. Where shall we go?"

"Let's go and see Michael first."

"All right," said Kelly. "Let's go and see Michael."

They took a taxi from the hotel to Michael O'Moore's apartment. During the ride George Lambton watched the crowded streets and said only one thing: "Christmas is a damn silly thing, Kelly. But it's a wonderful time for selling people things they don't need. So Christmas is maybe the biggest sham of all."

But Kelly had other thoughts. Somehow the people rushing in the streets and the bustling about the fronts of stores warmed her heart. Fathers with little children hanging on their overcoat sleeves cheered her up and made her feel a little sad. When they got to O'Moore's apartment building, Kelly began to worry that they would not be welcome there. She was even more worried when she saw the look on Michael O'Moore's face when he opened his door.

"Hello George, Kelly! It's good to see you," O'Moore turned. "Karen, look who's here, George and Kelly." But Kelly could see that their presence was spoiling a quiet, well-planned Christmas Eve. O'Moore was not the sort of person who liked to revise plans. A highly-successful television producer and playwright, O'Moore had made the grade George Lambton couldn't climb by his ability to plan ahead.

"Well, Michael, my friend," George Lambton was saying, "boyhood friend, fellow scholar and poet, could I trouble you for a drink?"

Karen O'Moore, a dumpy, beaten little woman looked worried. "We were just opening our Christmas presents, Kelly. I suppose it's silly. Most people do it Christmas day, but this has been a tradition with us for a long time. Excuse me." She dashed across the room to intercept one of the tiny O'Moore children who was heading for the kitchen with a new chemistry set.

George Lambton was proposing a toast. "To Christmas," he said solemnly, "to the greatest fake of all, to the big commercial Christmas tree, to the giant holly-crusted lie. To Christmas." He poured himself another drink.

"Now look here, George," muttered O'Moore. "The children, Christmas, isn't a fake for them."

"All right, Michael. Sorry." He sloshed down a drink. "Very sorry. We must preserve these dreams. After all they're almost harmless. Sorry I didn't think to bring some presents." He looked scornfully at the mess of wrappings under the frosty, shimmering tree.

There was silence. Michael O'Moore fiddled anxiously with the new tie he was holding.

"It's damned quiet in here," said George Lambton. "Let's all sing a song. A Christmas song. How about 'Jingle-Bell Rock'?" There's a good one."

"Now look, George. Please." O'Moore was beginning to show signs of strain. George stared at his glass, then put it down. "I guess we'd better get out of here. Let's go, Kelly."

The scene when they left was terribly embarrassing. Kelly felt miserable, but glad to go. When they were in the street again, she thought back to the warm little room and the tree, wishing they could have been a real part of what was happening there.

She guided her father along the street. The crowds were thinning now. Christmas music blaring from a loudspeaker over a record store abruptly ended as the last customer emerged. At the end of the street, a tired Santa Claus clanged his bell wearily and gave them a dirty look when they passed.

George Lambton wanted to go to a bar. Kelly told him the bars were all closed because it was Christmas Eve.

"We should go and eat, father," she said.

"Where are we going to eat?"

"Oh, anywhere," Kelly said. "I'm hungry." She took his arm and they went into the brightness of the big restaurant they were passing, through the glass door into the smell of food and wet coats and the sound of talking. They took a little table at the back.

"I suppose I can't get a drink here," Kelly's father said.

"No."

They were a long time being served. While they waited in silence, the crowd gradually thinned until there were only two or three couples left. Kelly watched a young boy and his girl sitting over their coffee. They seemed to be laying plans. She felt very sad and not at all like eating when the food finally came.

Simultaneous with the arrival of their food, was the arrival of a little man who made his way with sinister care into the booth next to the one Kelly and her father were in. He had a face like old, cracked leather and wore a huge army overcoat. He ordered a coffee and sat staring at Kelly until she began to feel uneasy. At length, she tried to outstare him, but the little smile on his creased face only grew more disturbing. Finally he looked away to light the half-smoked cigarette he pulled from a pocket, then turned and looked at Kelly's father.

"Hello, George."

George Lambton turned wearily to look.

"Hello, Bill," he said. "How are things?"

"Not too good," the little man said.

"How are things with you?"

"They're bad," he muttered. George Lambton looked up for a moment and Kelly saw in his face utter despair. She felt like crying and thought if she could get him a drink, she would do anything.

"If you could use a drink, George," the little man called Bill said in low tones. "I know where we could get one. Unfortunately, I don't have any money at the moment."

Kelly could see her father was torn. He looked briefly at her, then at his untouched bowl of soup. His hands were shaking, she noticed. "No thanks, Bill," he said. "Not right now." A silent convulsion gripped the upper part of his body as he spoke.

Kelly leaned across the table and touched his arm. "Look, father, go and have something to drink. I can go and see some friends here. I'll look you up tomorrow."

After a while, George Lambton and the little man were gone. Kelly ate some

And May All Our Xmases Not Be White

By SUSIE BRESLIN

Just 14 years and three days ago, The Varsity's Christmas Issue boasted a banner headline — "Snow Paralyzes University". U of T President H. J. Cody was stalled for three hours in a beleaguered train outside Toronto; university activities were cancelled; students volunteered for shovel duty, and some ingenious Torontonians took to skis for transportation when city streetcars were snowed in.

Blizzards seem to be a thing of the past nowadays for Toronto the Good — but snow still brings many problems. Every year brings its traffic fatalities, its tragic tie-ups impeding ambulances and fire-fighting equipment; its drownings due to hidden holes in ice-bound waters.

U of T has suffered only one near-tragedy in the past few years due to snow. In 1953 the roof of the Caledon Hills barn collapsed, and the caretaker was saved from injury only because he happened to be elsewhere at the time.

Most of the problems that come to U of T with the advent of snow are merely annoying ones. Cars skid and slide on the roads; students tramp enormous quantities of water on polished floors, and the inevitable warm spell turns Queen's Park into one vast lake, with subsidiary pools throughout the campus.

During that historic storm in 1944 a snow-bound Varsity staffer wrote bitterly of "the puny scrapings of the Superintendent's snow-shovelling staff." The efficiency of the Superintendent's staff has improved somewhat since then.

Shovels have been replaced by tractors which clean sidewalks and parking lots, and a contracted company supplies equipment to clean major roads.

But the job of cleaning up the snow still brings its problems. Even though the university has equipment ready and waiting to attack the enemy, "we don't have an opportunity to clean it up," assistant superintendent Alec Russell says.

Unless workmen manage to do their job in the early morning hours, hope is virtually lost of doing a complete snow-removal job. Early-arriving cars pack down the snow "so we can't clean it up properly," Mr. Russell says. Cars belonging to evening students further complicate the plowing job.

Campus roads eventually take on the look of abstract art, with widely curving snow banks and depressions marking the spot where some lone car has impeded the Progress of the Plow. Some unfortunate drivers return to campus after a few days of carefree pedestrianism to find their cherished auto surrounded by a two-foot icy wall of plowed snow.

Curses are always mixed with laughter when snow falls. The sophisticated collegian inevitably descends to heaving inaccurately aimed snowballs and taking a long, wobbly slide on ice-covered walks. And everywhere the traditional air of lofty reserve is broken as strangers join to solve the problems of a stranded car.

The Road to Miltown Treadmill to Oblivion

HOME BEFORE DARK Imperial presents soap opera of its best Director Mervyn LeRoy skillfully turns a typical tear-baker into a sensitive portrayal, meriting dignity and brutality.

Charlotte Jean Simmons has just returned from a year of the local mental hospital, suffering from shock treatments, and she is possessed with a desire to re-establish her personality and life. Unhappily, her husband (Don O'Herlihy), a stuffed-shirt college professor rejects her attempts to find security in his love. Intent on a promotion and afraid of scandal, he drives Charlotte to the brink of insanity again. He refuses to admit his passion for Charlotte's step-sister (Rhonda Fleming), and in the interests of his career, he refuses to contemplate divorce. Driven by his ambition, he denies the truth of his infidelity to his wife, and brutally undermines her faith in her powers of reason.

Although Director LeRoy guides his charges through a difficult plot in a superb manner, Don O'Herlihy stands out with one of the best performances of the year. Tyrannical, selfish, blind, insensitive, petty, but nevertheless adhering rigorously to his twisted code of ethics, O'Herlihy communicates the evil that lies in the actions of the average bigot. Jean Simmons graciously treads the fine line between madness and sanity with rare perception. Even Rhonda Fleming is adequate.

HOME BEFORE DARK shouldn't win an academy award, but this film offers a searching insight into the emotional tension within a close-knit group. The story may be confusing at times, but the message that people can be bestial is unmistakably clear.

THE GODDESS (Hollywood) is Paddy Chayevsky's ferocious caricature of the American Way of Life; a total attack on the institution of "Success".

His poignantly powerful story concerns the routine dream a small town girl has of someday leaving it all behind, on the wrong side of the tracks, and becoming a glamorous Hollywood star. This was the dream of Emily Ann Faulkner (Kim Stanley) born into tragic circumstance, fated for a life of material success, but emotional vacuity. Love was never a part of her life. Her father killed himself when she was four, and a few weeks later, she overheard her mother (Betty Lou Holland) begging some relatives to take the kid. "I don't want her!" she screamed. "I still got my figure. I want to have a little fun."

And so nobody paid any attention to little Emily Ann until nature endowed her and the local wolves did the rest. She despised them and herself for letting them, but she was just a counter girl in the five-and-dime and they came from the better side of the tracks. Her only support in this humiliating back-seat existence, was the dream that someday she would be a famous Hollywood star.

And then one day, Hollywood came shambling down Main Street, and fell drunk in the gutter. This was John Tower (Steve Hill) the paranoid outcome of a film-and-mismatch, but to Emily Ann he was a key to the gates of paradise, so she married him. Soon she had a baby. "I don't want her," she screamed. "I got a good figure. I want to have some fun."

So she left her kid with her mother, went to Hollywood, changed her name, got a divorce and married an ex-light-heavyweight champion, (Lloyd Bridges) for publicity. Pretty soon they started quarreling for want of something better to do, and shortly Reno's legal mill got some new business.

Then she clicked. The matinee set liked her in a small part, and the producer felt she had something. A quantity of availability.

And so a star was born. Soon she had everything. $4,000.00 a week, a sumptuous villa, and a nervous breakdown. She tried religion for a while, but decided she liked booze better. After that she just stumbled along, from drink to drink, picture to picture, sedative to sedative. "Life is a fraud," she decided and after realizing a life-long dream, her only comment is "So what."

This is all pretty dramatic stuff but in the skillful hands of director John Cromwell, it never degenerates into over-played melodrama. In scene after scene his consummate sensitivity and insight makes the 35mm frame a window through which the audience looks into life. The acting on all parts is restrained and outstanding. As the mother, Betty Lou Holland is painfully good. Actress Stanley, despite her obvious 33 years, makes the gradual aging of her character always believable in a serenely intense performance, richly deserving an Academy Award.

Chayevsky, of course, is the prime mover in the whole work. His razor-sharp script slashes out from the screen with biting force, leaving the viewer in a numbed state of shock. His satire is more often invective, but it has bigness and generous anger. As in his previous films, he again proves himself a significant moralist of manners and a considerable poet of appearance.

THE GODDESS is not only a powerful social document; it is also a deeply satisfying cinema experience.

Last year, the lover of Dixieland jazz spent his Saturday afternoons drinking deep of the New Orleans spring at the Museum Theatre, listening to the well-known work of Mike White's Imperial Jazz Band. This year, he has missed Mike at the Museum, but after some diligent research found him thoroughly established in the Basin Street lounge of the Westover Hotel, two blocks east of Jarvis.

There Mike on trumpet, Mike Snow on piano, Bud Hill on trombone, Ian Arnette on clarinet, Pete Bartran on bass, Ian Halliday on drums, and assorted famous guests may be heard each night at the usual Toronto bar hours, as well as on Saturdays for the three to five matinee.

The band has achieved in an astoundingly short space of time that secure niche in the world of jazz which merits guest artists like Edmund Hall, Art Hoades, Vic Dickinson, and last week George Lewis, playing with the group. It may be heard every Wednesday night at nine over CJBC, and releases this week a record of standards, with some of its own specialties intermingled, on Hallmark.

Such specialties include, "I Love Paris", almost immortalized by Pete Fountain last year, which the L.J.B. has been playing since it first was the L.J.B., and somewhat worthy originals.

The Imperial Jazz Band is now deservedly the Canadian Dixie group, and aside from a proposed trip to Newport this summer, intends to stay here. Basin Street provides an ideal atmosphere for fine Dixieland Jazz, and you will find Mike the most obliging guy in the world for special requests.

Members of U of T are often under the mis-guided impression that their rural cousins at OAC and OVC have no interest save agricultural, and no instincts save animal—well it is time that the stolid old arty types on U of T campus awoke from their cultural lethargy, and attempted an opera, such as OAC's highly successful venture, instead of being content to boast of only Gilbert and Sullivan as their operatic achievements.

OAC made a wise and timely choice with Gian-Carlo Menotti's "AMAH! AND THE NIGHT VISITORS." This opera was specially commissioned by NBC Television, and when it first appeared in 1961, it was the first opera to be written specifically for this medium. As a result the usual number of difficulties and obstacles involved in operatic productions are greatly diminished—only one set is required, few principal roles, a small chorus, and above all the production does not suffer without full orchestral accompaniment, as we found with OAC's effective two-piano accompaniment. Production costs are relatively low, and this short opera is well within the scope of an amateur group.

It was a fitting time for us to see Menotti's version of the Christmas story, originally inspired by Bosch's painting, The opera in the farmyard

Adoration of the Magi. The opera is the story of a poor little crippled boy, who is visited by the Three Kings, and by offering his crutch (his sole possession) to the Christ child, he is healed and can walk. It is a poignant little story, with elements of pathos, tragedy and humour, all heightened by Menotti's strident harmonies; the Guelph production was sensitive to all these, and did full justice to 'Amahl and the Night Visitors.'

The success of the opera was largely due to the exceptional vocal and dramatic talent of the Mother and Amahl (Arleen and John Barnum, mother and son in reality). Both these singers interpreted their roles with sensitivity, and vocal ability. The Three Kings were majestic and impressive, sumptuously clothed in the costumes from the Stratford Festival, (save for a pair of blue-spotted socks that serppitiously emerged from beneath the royal robes).

The main force and inspiration behind OAC's operatic venture was their musical director, Ralph Kidd; it was well worth his battle with authorities, and he has showed us what a University can do with opera.

University College is probably the most poetry conscious college at the U of T. It was more or less the centre of the publication last year of "Rubato". Its literary magazine, "the Undergrad" contains more poetry than any of the other college literary publications and even its newspaper, "the Gargoyle", has published poetry consistently and is soon to have to devote a whole issue to poetry at UC.

One of the most prolific poets in this college of prolific poets is John Robert Colombo. Recently his fifth published collection of poetry, "This Citadel in Time" appeared and is now on sale at the U of T book store.

Colombo is not a typical UC poet and an examination of the general poetic situation at UC might help explain the tremendous appeal of his work.

If a "Poetic Tradition" is emerging at UC it is being made articulate on "the Undergrad's" editorial page. Although their intent is entirely different these editorials rank with the preface to "Lyrical Ballads" as poetic manifestos that at least at UC are having a wide effect. The keynote of these articles of poetic faith is that "it is time for a new classicism." "Let us stop thinking in terms of the clichés of 20 years ago," say these editorials, and they go on to indicate that they would prefer the poets of UC to think in the terms of the clichés of a much earlier period.

This is the rationalist tradition in UC and it is by far the strongest there. These poets set about the task of teaching themselves how to write. They practice archaic forms such as the villanelle. They write copies of Homeric metric forms.

This in itself is not bad. A poet has to know his business. No matter how much he has to say, no matter how sensitive is his perception of the things around him or in a higher world, he cannot express it until he learns how. The trouble is that the UC classicism has given birth to a group of elegantly practiced poets who have nothing to say and have very little sensitivity. It does not resemble the Greek classicism of living marble nearly so much as the Roman classicism of dead plaster. It is a Mannerist classicism that is being used not as a means to expression but as a crutch to substitute for the absence of anything to express, and as such it is not classicism but pseudo-classicism. It is a decadent poetry that whispers because its insipidity cannot bear loud, clear speech.

On the other hand loud, clear speech is the most impressive thing about John Robert Colombo's poetry. In a college of whisperers Colombo has kept the refreshing faculty of being able to shout sustainably when there is something to shout about. And for Colombo there is almost always something to shout about.

In the dichotomy between the intellect and passion Colombo takes a resolute stand for passion.

"We are first cleansed by the four elements and then the fifth, desire, though our immersion in mind limits us, for little do we control this self we call ours, though our minds have one lapse the world will not lose."

The knowledge of passion, the knowledge of desire, the knowledge of a need that the rationalists do not feel, this is the peculiar power of Colombo's power poetry.

"This Citadel in Time" is a cycle of six religious poems. In their thought they owe something to Rilke, and in their intensity to Hopkins. The cycle begins in the instant of creation, the creation of this citadel in time.

"Inhabited in part, this citadel in time is man's as sister the soul, the church, or eyes of Christ, the soul of Him, in this pained dichotomy of desire and delight and the end of which must link the two, as creator is thrust upon his creation which speaks of Him — so must this citadel be man."

It moves into the synthesis of love expressed through the physical, and still it speaks of the high unity of the flesh and the spirit.

"Only is there vision now — with unity and life — and oceans roll where once there walked this conscious man in realms of ecstasy and pain. The lost light is united with its source."

Much later the synthesis ends in the Church.

"The sad and the smiling men and women stand motionless and still, if only for an instant, and then again slip back into their own lives and selves — but held for that instant, that one silent, uneasy second, alone with their God.

The peasant and the wise and the ignorant; long do they remember this."

There are some lessons that Colombo might afford to learn from the UC rationalists. Stylistically there is still room for some "cleaning up" in his poetry. Occasionally, for instance, he tends to let himself get carried away into an undisciplined alliterative doggerel. One example is "while shafts of the segments of suns stream their paths through the world or mind unto the very seas of self — there to purge and purify this dim remnant of a primitive past, of bone, blood, and belonging."

But these things are easily cleared up in a serious poet. Colombo can learn the lesson of the rationalists' fineness and control much more easily than they can learn the lesson of his passion and sensitivity.

The enduring value of Colombo's work is that in it, "there is only the give and grasp of longing as it, climbing, mounts into its assumption in most holy love."

LOOKING AT CANADIAN ARCHITECTURE (Oxford University Press), by Alan Gowans.

That an archaeologist has written a book on Canadian Architecture is an ironic commentary on the state of Architecture in Canada.

However, the author's historical approach is the logical and most consistent point of departure for an assessment of the Architecture in this country. Emphasis on traditional forms and an adaptive frame of mind have prevented Canada from producing either great or original Architecture. Canada's place in Architecture, viewed by the author, is as a sounding board in which the ideas, tastes and values of Western civilization may be discerned.

Four main patterns are evident in Canadian Architecture and serve as themes for various essays.

- (1) Man's triumph over nature as expressed by his control of materials, space and the relationship of structure to site.
- (2) National traditions which are expressed in forms such as domes, arches, vaults and decorative motifs which label a building Italian, French, or, in a limited sense, Canadian.
- (3) The difference between Architecture and building and how this differentiation has changed with time.
- (4) The pattern of historical styles and their influence on Canadian Architecture.

To pitch every building willy-nilly into one of these four slots would, however, be false to the author's thesis. The final judgment must be the structure itself as a work of art.

In setting out to write a popular book, the author has the advantage of a lucid style and some fine photographs of Canadian buildings. Through these photographs the reader may readily identify himself as a participant in the various essays; perhaps, too, they may cause the reader to pause and reflect on the familiar landmarks so often seen and so little remembered.

Al Bernholtz

daffydil nite

The program said, "tonight the frivolous comes to the fore. DAFFYDIL is a true reflection of the spirit of the School of Medicine." And after a cast of some one hundred fifty medical students had played, sung, and danced their hearts out for two hours, we had a good idea about what kind of spirit they were talking about.

Daffydil discarded its ideas about a book show this year, and the result was a spicy revue which is probably this year's best campus show. Part of the reason for this was that the opening number got the show off on precisely the right tack, six little fellows, clad appropriately enough in white, dashed onto the stage and rendered an introduction very reminiscent of the opening number of Clap Hands, except that it was faster, wittier, and dirtier. Following hard on this came the first double-take of the evening; the "Wandering Poet", in full Shakespearean garb, drifted onto the stage and asked the question, "Epelestomy or laxative?" This muse, played by John Walt, reappeared several times throughout the evening, always at the least expected moment, and delivered a number of brief odes in blank verse with medical flavour.

After this came three skits, and if the show bogged down anywhere it was here. Les Ash as Dr. Ham was funny but the writers gave him more life here. Les Ash as Dr. Ham was funny but the writers gave him more life here. Les Ash as Dr. Ham was funny but the writers gave him more life here.

Then the music began. The "Four Most" were excellent in a ditty about the village art, entitled "She Had Something to Sell". Glee club, dancers and the rest of the cast followed with a beautifully coordinated graduation sequence featuring some brilliant choreography which frequently drew spontaneous applause.

After the intermission, three window washers and the Glee Club gave a funny and rollicking rendition of "Everybody Wants to be a Doctor". Lynne Frederick delivered a monologue spoofing the Women's Auxiliary of the General Hospital, who run the students' snack bar. This girl has the happy ability to use her whole body to get across her lines, jesticulating here and there and really "filling the stage". Even when she forgot her lines (where was the prompter?) she was uproariously funny.

The graduating class took its annual swipe at the professors, and those in the audience who knew the men alluded to apparently thought this was quite good. In "Two Points of View", Bernie Slatt was an orderly and Jani Shikimba an embryo; in a cleverly designed costume (what there was of it) she looked like a shapely diaper with four beautiful limbs lutting out of it — all of them legs.

The finale, "Pride of Arabia", featured more good songs, more dazzling choreography and a great deal of colour. A sexy Arabian dance, a cha-cha, and a Charleston were done in rapid succession without a break in music, and the chorus practically had the audience singing with them at the final curtain.

Other amusing tidbits were inserted here and there throughout the show: they were all original and funny. Best among the dancing girls were Lil Poshen and Jenn Shikimba, but they were all good. Andrew Baines directed the orchestra, a 25-piece outfit composed entirely of students. Jim Rumball wrote most of the music, and it is as good as you will ever hear in a college show. If there is one serious weakness in the show, it is a tendency toward stale jokes and a tiresome preoccupation with excrement and genitalia: the censors have taken their cuts, but in the wrong places. Some lines I heard mentioned as cut were funnier and less objectionable than some of the lines left in. But the general quality is high and it makes for a splendid evening's entertainment. — PETRO-BRAWLEY.

sunrise at campobello

It has been asserted by men like Macaulay and Carlyle that history is not the mere recording of events but a drama full of vital characters, passions and conflicts. Certainly there has been of late, at least on the American stage, a recognition of this fact.

In SUNRISE AT CAMPOBELLO, Doro Schary has given us vital characters, conflicts, political gambles, the triumph of reason over prejudice. Schary does not concern himself with the New Deal period that made Roosevelt a world-famous figure. His intention is devoted solely on that three-year period in which the hale and hearty Roosevelt was transformed into a cripple and phoenix-like rose from the political bonfire to become once more a figure of national importance. Schary is interested in the effects which the polio calamity has on Roosevelt's character, social and political philosophy and his relations with his friends and family.

The Roosevelt we meet and see in Act I scene 1 is a far different Roosevelt from the one who in the last scene, on crutches and despite excruciating pain delivered the famous "Happy Warrior" speech, nominating Al Smith in 1934.

Schary has very definitely attempted to make his play historically accurate. The incidents, conversations and personality portraits correspond very closely to the real Roosevelt's. This is quite a tribute to Schary, for in the presentation of the play he desperately tries to cope with the octopus of the Roosevelt legend, but in the end he too succumbs.

One can hardly censurise him for that. The admirers and detractors of Roosevelt are legion. To the admirers he is a virtual saint, to the detractors a monster, a veritable Blob. Schary must be listed among the admirers. From them he has obtained the thesis which underlines the play, namely the contention that Roosevelt's battle with polio had transformed him from a flippant, haughty snob to a man of humility, patience, compassion and love.

That most North Americans share the convictions and beliefs of the New Deal crowd became obvious on noting the audience reaction to the first scenes. So vivid is the picture in the public mind of a smiling, lovable, "good neighbour" Roosevelt that people were shocked to hear his "Halcyon" accent, were amazed at his business speculations, and were flabbergasted at the sight of his imperious, dowager mother who hardly fits in with the concept of the American "Mom". The audience is much happier when, in Act III, F.D.R., sends Lassiter, the representative of the anti-Smith and anti-Catholic snobs, packing with a fiery speech on the American concept of toleration. This is the Roosevelt with which they are much more familiar.

Accepting the fact that Schary is of panegyric school he develops his plot and theme very systematically and effectively. From the very beginning we are caught up in the development of character, the clash of personalities and ideas. Standing on one side is the dowager empress, Sarah Delano Roosevelt. On the other, the patient Eleanor and the acid Howe. The elder Mrs. Roosevelt is content with the society she lives in, and has nothing but disdain for the low-born "god-damning" Howe and his low-born profession of politics. Roosevelt's illness simply intensifies her already overdeveloped maternal instincts and she wants her boy Franklin to return to Hyde Park to be once more under the maternal wing. Howe and Eleanor seeing the inherent greatness of F.D.R. want him to heed the "divine call" to lead a crusade for the betterment of mankind. It is around this conflict and around Roosevelt's internal conflict that the play revolves. As Roosevelt is forced to crawl before he walks, as he is forced to suffer and be still he achieves that compassionate understanding for despair, pain, and sickness that is so fundamental to any true reformer. The play ends on a happy note. Conflicts are gone, misunderstandings are at an end.

Lief Erickson's portrayal is indeed a memorable one. He looks like, talks like, and thinks like F.D.R. When he crawls, we crawl. When he stands, we stand. He bears faithful witness to the vitality, courage, and good humour of F.D.R. Michael Meyers as Eleanor gives us a vivid picture of a stoic patient and courageous woman who played such an important role in making Roosevelt the man he was. In Ann Shoemaker's portrayal of "Mama" we see a real professional at work and Russell Collins as Howe is acid, witty, very definitely entertaining. A skilled supporting cast, breezy and humorous dialogue and excellent settings all help to make this play worth seeing over the Christmas holidays.

Students Unopinionated As SAC Studies Report

Students' Administrative Council president Vince Kelly said Sunday a special SAC committee's study of the U of T Advisory Committee Report on Student Aid should be taking shape in January.

So far, he said the special committee has sent copies of the report to student presidents of faculties and colleges, asking for comments on the report to be returned by Dec. 10.

"We have received none," Kelly said. The SAC committee is privately preparing a study of the report which is to be forwarded to the campus presidents in January.

Kelly said it is hoped this will provoke some response from the student presidents.

The SAC committee also hopes to study the statistics used by the U of T President's Advisory Committee under U of T vice-president Murray Ross in preparing the report, Kelly said.

Copies of the SAC committee report are expected to go also to prominent U of T students other than the presidents, with a similar request for comments, Kelly said.

Kelly pointed out that the National Federation of Canadian University Students has also forwarded copies of the Advisory Committee Report to a large number of prominent students.

Members of the SAC committee, privately called together by Kelly, are: Kelly, SAC vice-president Adrienne Poy, National Affairs Committee chairman Bob Lee, NAC member Doug Branson and University Committee chairman Norm Levine.

Placement Experiment — A Big Success Here

The second year of the U of T's unique experiment in helping students in graduating years of professional faculties find employment has been termed "a success".

Placement Service Director J. K. Bradford said Sunday night "I believe the system has more than proved that innovation is needed, and I think our system goes a long way to providing the needed innovations."

Representatives of 102 firms invaded the campus last Thursday, Friday and Saturday to interview over 600 graduating engineers, and students from Maths, Physics, Chemistry, Geology and Geo-Physics courses.

Toronto is the only university in North America which holds all its job interviews at once. At most universities, interviewing is done throughout the entire academic year.

"Our system is much easier for students, employers and faculty," Mr. Bradford said.

"It's attracted considerable attention all over the continent. In each of the two years the system has been in use, we have had two American observers up to see it."

At 8:30 p.m. the Hart House Glee Club will make a grand entrance bearing the traditional garished boar's head. Their half-hour concert will include a special arrangement of "Jingle Bells", many old favorites and some little-known medieval carols.

Faculty and college representatives will get into the Christmas spirit at 9 p.m. with a gift-giving session between traditional rivals.

Warden McCulley and President Bissell will end the Christmas Tree after an intermission with a Christmas story and a talk.

Tickets for the Tree are free. They will be available at the Students' Administrative Council office today and tomorrow from 12:30-1:30 p.m.

Student Here Wins First

A U of T graduate student learned Sunday night he has copped top spot in a national student photography contest.

Bruce Collins will receive $175 for winning the grand prize in the National Federation of Canadian University Students' photo contest. A friend persuaded him to enter the contest at the last minute, Collins said.

The win marks the second time U of T has topped the winner's list in the contest's three-year history. Collins' entry was a color slide titled "Scarborough Bluffs."

U of T students also won six other prizes out of a total of 20 awarded by contest judges, and three honorable mentions. Toronto prizewinners took in $350 of the $800 prize money.

Other U of T winners are:

Cliche U of O President —

OTTAWA (CUP)—Louis Cliche, one of three fired editors of the University of Ottawa's La Rotonde, is now president of the Students' Federation.

Cliche was elected Friday in a 1,000-vote campus-wide referendum. Majority over his opponent was a scant 50 votes.

"The first thing to do is strengthen the students' council so we can meet issues on a firm basis," Cliche said last night.

He also said he would initiate a constitution for the council. "We should have had one 11 years ago," he said.

Cliche's opponent ran on a generally pro-authority platform.

"The vote was close because all elections here are like that," Cliche said.

JARGON: Faculty Editors Named

Jargon editor John Robert Colombo last night announced the roster of the magazine's editorial staff and faculty representatives.

Faculty editors are Miss Jay Macpherson, winner of the 1957 Governor-General's Award for poetry; Prof. Hugo McPherson of University College and Dr. Milton T. Wilson of Trinity.

"Miss Macpherson will consider the poetry submitted, Prof. McPherson will judge the fictional submissions and Dr. Wilson will look after reviews and any other material not falling into the broad categories of poetry and fiction," Colombo said last night.

"The faculty editors give their judgments on all articles submitted to the magazine. These are not binding but will definitely carry a lot of weight in the final selection of the material to be printed," he continued.

Final choice of the works to be published will be made by the magazine's editorial board, consisting of Alex Havriliant, Susie Breslin, Liz Binks and one other member, to be named in the near future.

Aim of the magazine's founders is "to publish a literary magazine of high calibre and broad interest, incorporating original and published material by students of all faculties," he said.

Germ of the idea of an all-campus literary magazine appeared over a year ago, and last spring a 16-page literary insert was included in faculty literary publications.

Last year's SAC approved the plans for a separate magazine late in the spring term, and the scheme was put into operation earlier this fall.

Deadline for all material for Jargon, which will be 48-pages, is Feb. 1. Initial press run is 1,500 copies, but this will be increased if the magazine is of a high calibre, Colombo said last night.

"So that Jargon may be at least partially self-supporting, a nominal price, probably 75 cents, will be charged," he said.

Articles may be submitted either to Colombo or to the representatives in various faculties.

Arts representatives are: David Helwig (UC); Joan Bulger (SMC); Steve Hayes (Vic); and Elizabeth Harrison (Trinity).

Faculty representatives include Michael Heuer (SPS); Harvey Newton, Bob McCaldon (Meds); Cino Cundari (Law); Bert Ross (OCE); Bruce MacDougall (Forestry); Bill Aide (Music); Liz Hubbell, Doug Tindall (SGS); Terry O'Shaughnessy (Dents); Tony Kemp (Arch); and Charlotte Hubbell (Nursing).

Representatives for the faculties of Household Science, Library School, Pharmacy, Physical Health and Education, Social Work, Business Ad, University Extension and School of Child Study have yet to be appointed.

Persons interested in filling these posts are requested to contact Colombo, at UC's Sir Daniel Wilson Residence, WA. 3-7933.

BLUES TACKLE DUNLOPS

World Champions Here Tomorrow Night At 8

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

When the smoke clears over what is perhaps the most controversial Blues hockey team in years, we find the controversy still raging along.

Before an expected capacity crowd at Varsity Arena tomorrow night, the great effort expected of Blues may very well terminate with a shrug of the shoulders.

On the other hand, should Varsity be able to hold the world champion Whitby Dunlops to anything that resembles a close contest, or better yet, defeat them, we are led to believe that representing Canada in the 1960 Olympics will no longer be a pipe dream for Varsity Blues.

To Dunlops, this unexpected intruder into their realm of endeavour is not a pleasant one. There's no doubt Whitby will wish to do away with this upstart once and for all.

Currently setting a sizzling pace in the Eastern Division of the OHA Senior A league, Whitby, at last count, lead the pack with several games in hand. By the time they meet Blues, they will have played 25 league games.

Varsity Blues have now competed in three league games and nine exhibition tilts. Two of the exhibition contests came when a majority of the squad were skating for the first time this season, while the ill-fated Colorado jaunt was nothing more than an endurance test.

Whether Varsity can turn the trick on Whitby remains to be experienced. Notable for their ability to play up or down to their opposition, we only wish that Blues could have played a few more games against some Senior A type opposition.

However, we feel that over-taxing Blues in this manner is not altogether fair. The Intercollegiate loop is, after all, the field of competition for Varsity. This fact we are all, at times, guilty of forgetting.

Varsity lost their first game of league play to the highly touted Laval squad, but have defeated both McGill and Montreal in no uncertain fashion. We feel certain, however, that Blues can, and will, dominate the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate League.

If the type of play Varsity exhibited against Carabins last Friday is any criterion, then Blues are going to be a very tough team to defeat.

Never quite performing as a polished unit, Blues nevertheless applied the pressure for 60 minutes of the game. The motto was dig, dig, dig, and it paid off with a goal in every period.

We firmly believe College hockey in Canada is as competitive and thrilling as found anywhere.

Coach Clare Drake of the University of Alberta Golden Bears, has expressed a wish for an all-Canadian Intercollegiate hockey final, with the ultimate winner forming the nucleus of the Olympic representative.

There, we feel, lies the most sensible suggestion of all. Too much time and energy are wasted on trips of much less significance.

The Varsity sports department has written of this matter to the respective newspapers of the western colleges. It is hoped we may contribute to the promotion of what we feel will become an Intercollegiate classic.

And so we wish a Merry Christmas; to the coaches Jack, Captain Mike, the Gold-dusters, the B'ars, and all the worthy wearers of the Blue. Merry Christmas to; the managers, Zamboni drivers, ice makers, skate sharpeners, ticket takers, and all hockey-gamers wherever you may be.

O yeah! Happy New Year too!

Baby Blue Rally Fell Short By Loss To Rams In Final

A comeback that fell short. That fairly well sums up the 1958 season for the most recent edition of the University of Toronto Baby Blues football team.

They failed in their initial objective — to retain the Shaw Trophy, emblematic of the Intercollegiate intermediate football championship; but they did rally to a comeback after two early season losses that did the Argonauts justice.

Playing without any exhibition games, coach John Sopinka's inexperienced crew took the field with Ryerson Rams as their first opponents. Rams wasted no time in establishing themselves as the team most likely to dethrone Baby Blues by blanking them 18-0.

The next week was even worse as Western Colts made future Senior seasons look grim while they pasted Baby Blues 19-6.

This was the low point of the season. But the rain always gives way to sunshine, and the clouds started to break the next week in Kingston as Rinkies beat Queen's Comets 22-7.

The following week saw a repeat, in spades, as the Comets had a 31-2 defeat hung on them by an improving Varsity crew.

Baby Blues defeated Western Colts 21-19 in their fifth game to move into second place and set the stage for the final game of the season with Ryerson.

One game behind the leaders,

Rinkies had to win to get a share of the title.

Midnight came for the Intermediates, however, as Ryerson won out in a squeaker 8-7. The lion's share of the credit for the successful season belongs to coaches Bill Stephenson and Sopinka who welded a very inexperienced group into a team.

Basketball Blues Off To The Sunny South

By MIKE CHYKALUK
Varsity Sports Editor

The basketball Blues departed by car this morning for Mississippi Southern where they play the first game of a ten-game tour.

Coach John McManus, manager Bob Dann and ten players made the trip.

Peter Potter, Jimmy Maguire, and John Dacysbyn were unable to take time out to make the southern journey. Dacysbyn may join the team after Christmas. Speaking of Christmas, the team will spend this year's festive season, minus snow, in hot, humid and cheerless Florida. Sweet nothings from home may be forwarded to the team at the Windward Apartments, 2912 East Las Olas Boulevard, Ft. Lauderdale, Florida.

Varsity, defending senior Intercollegiate basketball champions, have won two out of seven exhibition tussles thus far this season. They lost the last two 83-55 to St. Peter's and 64-44 to Seton Hall. This year's team boasts four rookies, six lettermen from last year's team, and three players who were ineligible the previous season.

Blues certainly have the potential to repeat as kings of the Intercollegiate loop if they can jell into some sort of a machine (where did we hear that word before?).

They have plenty of hustle in fellows like Curt Russell, Goldring and Dacysbyn, blazing speed in guards Joe Stulac and Potter, deadly shooting in the likes of Ruby Richmond and Don Lipke and excellent rookies in Bob Ecclestone, Maguire, Izzy Mandel and Bill Patterson.

The only department Varsity is weak in is the lack of height. They don't grow them tall around here any more, some thing to do with the genes, you know. However, this weakness (lack of height) could be overcome to a degree by sheer aggressiveness.

The experience gained against the superior U.S. foes should greatly benefit our Toronto representatives. They should be in excellent condition when they return January 12, after a week's rest, to be a definite threat for the Intercollegiate title.

Meantime, they have manager Bob Dann along to look after their spiritual needs. So the frozen daquiris are slightly warm. Who cares? It's Christmas time Cheers!

Irish Gain Reed Trophy Lead On Soccer, Lacrosse Points

By DAVE GRINER
Associate Sports Editor

St. Michael's College have opened up a 778 point lead in the Reed Trophy race, according to statistics released yesterday by Kay Boyd, secretary to the athletic director.

Trailing the Irish total of 6408, are Skule, 5630, Medicine 5591, Trinity 5586, and UC 5087 as the five faculties and colleges continue to wage one of the closest races in years.

Far behind are Victoria 3034, and Dentistry 3004.

Wycliffe has a commanding lead in Division Two, as their total of 6128 represents a near 1800-point bulge over the runners-up, Forestry. Knox remains in the hunt with 3961 points.

The St. Mike's lead has been made possible primarily by the fine performances by their soccer and lacrosse teams.

They got to the finals in soccer play before being upset by Trinity in the snow by a 4-1 count.

The lacrosse team had better luck as they whipped UC two games to one in the lacrosse finals.

UC took the first lead, by an 18-14 count, but Curt Russell shadowed UC's high scoring Bert Naylor into oblivion and the Irish won the last two matches 19-10, and 20-8.

Wycliffe's surprising lead has been built virtually singlehandedly by their championship soccer team. Of the six thousand-odd points credited to Wycliffe, the soccer team has been responsible for nearly four thousand of them. They defeated Forestry 4-1 in the final, and were going to challenge the Division One winners, Trinity, but inclement weather made the match unfeasible.

Intramural football saw one big upset, and the revitalization of one of the colleges, UC.

Trinity waltzed through the regular schedule undefeated, only to fall victim to a fired-up Skule team in the semi-final of the Mulock Cup.

UC-PHE edged out Junior Skule for the lead in Group Two to enter the semi-final against Victoria. Although beaten decisively they showed that better times are ahead for football at UC.

Skule were no match for the powerful Vic team in the final as they succumbed 29-1 to the winners' strong ground and air assault.

UC Firsts and Trinity have taken early leads in the hockey in Group's I and II respectively.

UC, undefeated to date, appear to be the best bet to dethrone defending champions St. Michael's. Trinity are out of their class in Group II and have won all their games to date by wide margins.

The Senior and Junior teams from SPS have proven to be real powerhouse in the squash matches played so far. Both are undefeated in their groups.

Senior and Junior Skule will oppose each other in an all-Engineering volleyball final to be played this Friday.

UC-PHE walked off with the intramural track title as they amassed 80 points and nine firsts in finishing 62 points ahead of their nearest competitor, Medicine.

Outstanding for UC were Norm Mencil, Terry Wensley, and Mike Berger.

Mencil won the high jump, the broad jump, and finished second in the hop, step and jump. Berger won the three mile race and finished second in the mile, while Wensley was second in the broad jump and finished third in the hop, step and jump.

Grid Blues Were Great In Taking Championship

What started off in early September reports as a two-way battle for the Intercollegiate football championship turned into a question of just how many records Varsity Blues would establish before the curtain rang down on November 8.

Pitted three times against the powerful Western Mustangs, Blues edged John Metras' crew, 26-20, in the first floodlight game ever played in the college loop, that being in Varsity Stadium September 26.

Blues followed that victory with a 38-14 win two weeks later in the second meeting between the two clubs, and dispelled any doubts as to the comparative strength of the teams with a resounding, 46-0 pasting of the Mustangs in London November 1.

Varsity coach, Dalt. White, operating against critics who had placed confidence in Western to retain the championship and the Yates Cup, unleashed a key newcomer in a return to the T formation, and opened the season with a win, despite the disadvantage of having no exhibition games.

A week later, with 12,593 fans in attendance, Tim Reid and a rookie sensation Pete Joyce — a present from Royal Military College — spearheaded a Varsity attack that subdued Western and brought back memories of the famous Steve Oneschuk-Phil Muntz combination.

Each scored two touchdowns to provide the scoring punch, while a key interception by Larry Joynt in the final minute nipped a thrilling Western rally, sparked by quarterback Frank Cosentino.

On October 4, Blues journeyed to Montreal, survived a third-quarter McGill rally, and came home with a 35-13 win. Reid burst out for the first of two three-touchdown afternoons, as quarterback Brian Aston ran a deadly option play to perfection.

October 11 was a big day in Toronto, as Blues overcame a series of publicity gimmicks from Western Coach Metras (in which he patted two of his players roundly on the back) and whipped the Horsies 38-14 before 11,488 spectators here.

Aston was the individual standout, passing for three touchdowns and running for a fourth himself. Although Blues held the edge in play for most of the game, it was a sparkling fourth quarter, in which Varsity could do no wrong and Western no right, that brought the game to a rising climax.

Playing back-to-back games with Golden Gaels, Blues emerged victorious in each, whipping the Tricolour 44-0 here October 18, and taking a 32-3 win in Kingston the following Saturday. Western, meeting McGill twice, kept their playoff hopes alive with 39-8 and 28-6 wins, the first in Montreal. That left Mustangs four points behind Toronto, and set the stage for the season's BIG game in London November 1.

One-eyed Benny was the only sure one. He called Blues by 47-1, and gloated quietly as Varsity swarmed to a smashing 46-0 victory, thereby inflicting Mustangs with their worst defeat—home or away—since commencing Intercollegiate play.

The season finale would have been an anti-climax but for the facts that Blues whipped McGill, 50-7, to become only the third team in college history to score 50 points in one game, and Tim Reid raced for three touchdowns to break 100 points for his Varsity career.

The final scoring statistics placed Reid in first place with 68 points, followed by team-mate Joyce with 54. Four days after the final game, co-captain Curt Russell was selected winner of the Johnny Copp Memorial Trophy, awarded to Blues' outstanding player.

By a vote of all league players, Joyce was named winner of the Omega Award, presented annually to the most valuable player in the Intercollegiate league.

Christmas—commercially—is a bother!

How often and suddenly we misplace the true meaning of this joyous festival in the myriad of red and green newspaper advertisements and the money-mad conglomeration of eager merchants and frantic shoppers.

I know, because I followed the crowd to Simpson's last Saturday, and I escaped with my life to write this column. (There are some people who will wish I hadn't.)

I slammed elbows with the cigar-smoking ex-wrestler at the tobacco counter, and I crept as inconspicuously as possible through the ladies' undergarment department.

I knew what I wanted to buy, but I stood about as much chance of getting near the necessary counters as I did of passing that examination I was supposed to have written yesterday.

Small men and giant "ladies" battered each other about like two trains trying to beat each other to the same destination on the same one-way track.

Pockets were picked, shoes trampled, stockings shredded, nerves demolished, and financial resources severely attacked.

And all for the sake of following that commercial prodding and urging to "make Mother and Father happy this Xmas with a gift from . . ."

Fiddlesticks!

But I fought the mobs like everyone else, and it wasn't until I gave up and headed home—giftless—that the true Christmas spirit blossomed out of snow-ridden downtown Toronto.

There, in the midst of the Christmas advertising and shopping panic, the taxi-driver left his cab and helped a little, old lady across the Queen and Yonge intersection.

A short distance up Yonge Street, the sudden wino lurched out of a tavern, stopped beside a Salvation Army lass, and unsteadily deposited a dollar bill in the receptacle.

And in front of one of those loudspeakers that literally boom Silent Night into the hustle and bustle, a little boy pulled his father to a stop, and said: "I know that song, Daddy."

Father smiled down at his son, and they walked on up Yonge Street, hand-in-hand. There was true Christmas spirit.

How much more meaning lay in those insignificant, every-day incidents than the pile of presents heaped so high you couldn't tell whether it was a spruce tree or a raspberry bush.

And on that note, may we wish a joyous and rewarding Christmas to some pretty important people in this hectic University of Toronto life:

To athletic director Warren Stevens and his all-too-kind and ever-so-genial secretary, Phyl Lea.

To intramural athletic director John McCutcheon and the two gals who work their fingers to the bone to keep the sporting endeavours of 7,000 male undergraduates on file.

To assistant director of physical education Mel Griffiths—about the only person in Hart House who flatters us with the title Mr. Brooks.

To a host of athletes about whom it is a real pleasure to write, even with the essays piled to the ceiling.

To Lance (North Toronto Herald) Affleck and his gang of golden-hearted composers who slave without complaint over our confused and confusing copy.

To the sports staff of The Varsity, pictured above in one of their more photogenic moments.

To a very special person whose presence has added to Christmas 1958 a type of happiness you can't even describe.

And to everybody else, and thanks for putting up with us; we'll be back in '59.

Three Titles In Seven Minor Sports Record

Although well represented, and falling back on a comparatively huge student body, mighty University of Toronto failed to make much of an impression on minor Intercollegiate competition this year.

Matters began on the right foot when our golfing foursome overcame an 11-year drought to win the title at Kingston's Cataract course. Witold Weynerowski, Bruce Brewer, Bill Lynch and Ron Fletcher combined for a sizzling 639 to beat runner-up McGill by 14 strokes.

Tennis representatives McGibbon and Shaver, Hall and Anderson, gained victories in doubles play, to highlight an otherwise weak showing in the net game.

Toronto slipped badly in track events, seniors placing third while intermediates finished in an unimpressive fifth place. Ken Money paced the Varsity effort in the senior meet by setting a high-jump record. Money cleared the bar with a 6'5" hop.

Varsity's harrier hopes finished fourth in their trials.

In a two-game total-point series, water polo Blues fought McGill to the wire, before losing by a single goal.

Senior soccer Blues enjoyed a successful season. In the Eastern group finals, Blues defeated McGill while tying OAC in the Western division play. Varsity also defeated University of Michigan 2-0 in international competition.

The intermediate soccerites lost to the champion Ryerson squad in their soccer action.

The senior rugby Blues lost to McGill in a two-game, total-point series, but gained a draw with OAC of the intermediate A loop, when the finals were cancelled because of weather.

The intermediates failed in their bid for the rugby laurels.

And so, with the new year approaching, there are many fields of endeavour remaining for Varsity athletes. Competitions in squash, skiing, fencing, gymnastics, boxing, wrestling, and swimming are all pending. Better luck, Varsity!

Students Do Their Part

U of T students, perpetually accused of cynicism and apathy, really turn Christian at Christmas.

U of T students, perpetually accused of cynicism and apathy, really turn Christian at Christmas.

All this fall students were criticized for not supporting charity drives, but now that Christmas is approaching they are changing their ways.

Parties for underprivileged children from the University Settlement are being planned by many campus organizations and some have already taken place.

Physical and Occupational Therapy students took over the Trinity Buttery last Thursday to entertain 60 Settlement girls aged eight to 12. Representatives from all the faculties, supervised by Joyce Pearl, (U of T) led the children through games at Margaret Eaton Hall, followed by a turkey dinner, Christmas carols and a movie.

Engineering will carry on a Skule tradition with a party in Hart House for about 25 Settlement boys between the ages of 12 and 16. The youngsters will eat a sit-down dinner in the Grads' dining room, including the inevitable turkey, and participate in sporting events in the Hart House gymnasium and swimming pool.

The Hart House Undergraduate Society is planning a similar party for tomorrow night, with the boys aged eight to 12 from the Settlement.

Carols movies and gifts of candy will follow the turkey dinner. About 70 boys are expected.

The Faculty of Dentistry has a party slated for Thursday night in the L.O.O.F. Hall. Patrons of the faculty, staff members and students will be present to help in feeding 50 underprivileged children from a Toronto public school. Several fraternities are joining the faculties in entertaining children for Christmas. The men of Beta Theta Pi and women of Gamma Phi Beta pooled their thoughts and came up with a new twist on an old idea.

The two fraternities decided to concentrate on helping older people. Invitations to a dinner party were sent out to 20 senior students recommended by the Welfare Society, and on Monday, Dec. 8, they were picked up by members of the fraternities and delivered to the Beta Theta Pi House.

The guests were treated to a turkey dinner and carol sing.

Several organizations, not having formal parties are taking contributions from all their members and are forwarding them to the University Settlement for distribution among the children.

Bankers are human, new study shows

In a recent nationwide survey, using the latest scientific sampling techniques, it was discovered that bankers are human—or at least that's what 9 out of 10% Canadians think. We are even credited with being friendly, helpful, trusting, honest and happy.

At the BNS we are more than a little proud of this recognition, for we feel that the BNS has pioneered in this development. BNS people have been known to smile at customers—even at college students. We say good morning regularly—every 24 hours or so. There is even a BNS Vice-President who whistles while he works.

But don't just take our word on BNS human-ness. Drop around at one of our nearby branches and see for yourself. Whether you come for scientific observation... for a chequing or savings account... for a Scotia Plan loan... or for some friendly financial advice, you're always welcome.

UC's Open Meetings Up For Trial Today

The future of a University College tradition — the open meeting — will hang in the balance at 1 p.m. today.

Bill Davis, UC Literary and Athletic Society president said Sunday an open meeting of the society will be held in the UC Junior Common Room to discuss the future of the meetings.

The decision to hold the noon-hour meeting comes in the wake of the forced adjournment of a scheduled meeting last Wednesday. The meeting was cancelled because attendance fell far short of the 50-man quorum.

All US students are members of the Lit and are eligible, and encouraged to attend the open meetings.

Today's meeting, Davis said, will "amicably discuss" the future of open meetings — when they should be held, if they should be held and so on.

In addition to the question of open meetings themselves, today's open meeting will vote on an amendment to the Lit constitution which would allow the Lit to have by-laws.

In addition, several "minor revisions" in the electoral procedures of the society will be discussed, Davis said.

News Staff

There will be a meeting of all news staff, present, past and potential, in this office at 4 p.m. Monday, Jan. 5 in the Varsity office for the purpose of reorganizing for the second term.

Potential staffers who have been frightened off by timetable worries or the news editor are especially invited, because we have been working on new, streamlined, speedy, less-time-consuming ideas.

"As We Walked Out On The Streets Of Havana"

Jerry Becker, a second-year U of T dentistry student, and Marvin Barkin, of Osgoode Hall, were in Havana, Cuba, when Fidel Castro's revolution struck. The two students, 23 and 22 respectively, managed to escape from the scene of civil war with a ship-load of Americans. Last night, they returned to Toronto. Here, in his own words, is Jerry Becker's story.

By JERRY BECKER

When Fidel Castro's revolution hit the city of Havana on the morning of Jan. 1, we were at the Nacional Hotel sitting by the pool.

Suddenly the streets broke out in flags and car-loads of armed youths poured forth shouting slogans.

It was the first we knew anything was happening — about 10.15 a.m.

Everywhere there were cars honking, each one bearing the "26" that represents Castro's July 26th revolutionary movement.

From the pool we watched the activity in the streets. Cars were speeding around erratically, each filled with 10 or 12 persons, with more on the hoods and running boards.

Then groups of young people started to gather. They all carried wooden clubs and pretty soon they were using these to smash parking meters open. When they had smashed open the meters, they pulled up the metal posts and used these to smash more.

The public address system in the hotel warned us not to go into the streets. Outside, we watched the rioting and saw police cars passing, blowing their horns and doing nothing else.

The police didn't try to stop the young people from breaking the meters.

Inside the hotel, we learned the rebels controlled the airport and we would not be able to leave on the 5 p.m. flight as we had planned.

By early afternoon we were still in the Nacional Hotel. Now there were armed people in the streets. Every one bore the "26" armband and they were armed with every sort of firearm — pistols, shot-guns, burp-guns, and sub-machine guns.

Our own hotel, the St. John's Hotel, was a block from the Nacional. At 4 p.m. we decided to try to get back to it.

When we went into the street, there was machine-gun fire nearby. A block away, the Capri Hotel was being attacked by a mob, storming the gambling casino. They broke in and we heard gunfire there.

We managed to get to the corner our hotel was on. Everyone we passed was armed.

Near our hotel, a car-load of armed youths — there must have been 15 of them in the car — bore down on us shouting and threatening us.

"American tourist," they shouted, "stay off the streets. This is only for Cubans," they hollered. They opened the door of the car and we ran for the hotel.

Caput Meets

SPS Christmas Tree Destroyed

The U of T's supreme disciplinary body, the Caput, will meet within the next few weeks to discuss the action it will take following the confession of five students that they took part in the destruction of the Faculty of Engineering's Christmas tree.

This statement was made by Engineering Dean R. R. McLaughlin last night.

The 30-foot tree, donated by the dean, was embedded in three feet of concrete Friday night, Dec. 12. The tree was sawed off just above ground level the following Tuesday night.

Engineering Society president R. B. Schaeff said last night that Society officials were outraged over the incident. The tree was strung with several dozen lights and with decorations the officials had made themselves.

The matter was taken to the Caput that week because of the "wanton destruction" and the monetary loss.

President C. T. Bissell is chairman of the Caput. Members are the heads of each faculty and college, and Hart House Warden Joseph McCulley. The president and vice-president of the SAC are also represented.

According to the five students, all members of Delta Tau Delta fraternity, they chopped off the top eight or nine feet of the tree for their own use after learning that several students of the School of Architecture were planning to take the tree down.

The architects allegedly returned the lights from the remainder of the tree to Delta Tau Delta, and two engineers who were involved in the original theft then returned them to the Engineering Society.

Schaeff said a letter had been received from the guilty engineers with their apologies for the part they had played.

Dean McLaughlin said last night he felt it out of place for him to comment at this time since he sits on the Caput.

He said, however, that the Caput had not yet reached any decision. The five students known to be guilty will be called before the Caput for an explanation, he said.

Meantime a notice appeared yesterday in the School of Architecture from Dean Howarth. He asked the students of the school who have any knowledge of the affair to admit the part they had played.

A reliable source within the school said last night those concerned are "first-year students who were trying to 'pull a prank.'" They simply did not consider the consequences of their action," the source said.

Engineering Society president Schaeff said the transportation for the tree was roughly $25. "The expense would have been much greater had Dean McLaughlin not donated the tree from his own property," said Schaeff.

"This is just another sickening example of the 'I don't give a damn' attitude that seems to prevail on this campus," Schaeff said.

PC's Score, CCF In Basement Parliament Meets Next Week

Preparations by the three campus political parties for next week's U of T Model Parliament are in full swing after a rush election last term saw the Progressive Conservatives returned to power.

Big change in the voting outcome saw the CCF, last year's second-most popular party, shoved into the campus political basement by the Liberals.

Although the election, originally scheduled for early this term, had to be suddenly pushed forward to the last week of the fall term because of a conflict between Ontario government and Model Parliament session dates, voting was only slightly lower than last year.

Turnout was approximately 1950. The timing conflict was caused by the fact that the Model Parliament meets in the Ontario legislative chambers.

An unofficial breakdown of the votes saw the Conservatives walk off with about 725, the Liberals win 695 and the CCF eke out 520.

Sources said voting in University College, traditional CCF stronghold, was low although the CCF managed to stay top-dog in UC.

Most other colleges and faculties also voted in time-honored manners.

Under a slightly-amended system of Model Parliament seating, the Conservatives will be guaranteed a three-seat majority in the parliament, meeting Jan. 13, 14 and 15, while the other two parties will split the remaining seats in a ratio of votes polled.

A partial list of the Conservative cabinet was released last night. Prime Minister will be Jeremy Johnson (IV Trin); Minister of External Affairs, Gord Ross (I Law); National Defence, Bruce Haines (I Law); Agriculture, Del O'Brien (I Law); Labor, Max Rotstein (III UC) and Northern Affairs, Dave Crane (II Vic).

Conservative party whip Doug Peppiatt last night called the Conservative legislative program for the upcoming parliament "the most progressive and concerted that's been presented to the Model Parliament."

He blamed the strong Liberal showing on an "undue amount of energy" expended by the Conservatives on the CCF in the election campaign.

Liberal president Dick Hamilton attributed Liberal gains to a "very active" campus club and "possibly to a gradual change of public opinion in our favor."

CCF'er Giles Endicott said he "wouldn't be surprised" if unemployment became an issue in the parliament.

He suggested that part of the Liberal success could be attributed to the "hurried nature" of the parliament election. "I don't think either their program or the way they presented it" could be responsible for such a vote, he said.

A possible reason for the Conservative success, Endicott said, was a tendency to "follow the Federal trend." He said there is "perhaps a trend to vote for the party that wins."

UofT Publishes Drinking Study

A comprehensive study of alcoholism in Canada has been published by the University of Toronto Press and reveals the estimated number of alcoholics in the country in 1956—a giant 180,990.

The book, which deals with Canadian alcoholic consumption in general as well as with alcoholism, is a compilation of facts gathered by the Alcoholism Research Foundation.

The book reveals a national rate of 1,890 alcoholics for every 100,000 Canadians—a higher rate than in Norway, Finland, Australia, England or Italy. It is a lower rate than in Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, Chile, the United States, or France, the only other countries where similar estimates have been made.

The study, which deals with figures going back as far as 1871, reveals that Ontario, Quebec, and British Columbia lead the nation in alcoholism.

The study gives estimates of the drinking habits of Canadians for the postwar period with various breakdowns.

In 1881, the study shows, there were 366 convictions for drunkenness for every 100,000 persons over 15. In 1913 the figure fell to 1,299, to 58 in 1933 but rose to 882 in 1955.

Convictions for "keeping or operating an illicit still" have fallen from a high of 1,068 in 1923 to zero in 1955.

Old-time Mulock Documents Given To UC By Graduate

Certificates awarded almost 100 years ago to Sir William Mulock were recently returned to University College.

Hidden since the death of Sir William in 1944, the certificates were discovered by UC graduate Howard Somers, who purchased them and presented them to UC Archivist H. M. Milnes on Dec. 22.

Along with the 13 subject certificates was a hand-illuminated copy of a resolution of thanks presented to Sir William by the UC Senate in 1885, in return for a scholarship grant of $2,000.

The resolution was illuminated by Robert Williams of Toronto,

By AL WALKER
Varsity Staff Reporter

and measures about 14 in. by 20 in. It is in what appears to be the original frame, and is signed by Registrar William Dale and President Daniel Wilson.

The scholarship set up by the fund still exists. It is to the value of $60 and is awarded to a second year UC student in Classics.

"As soon as I saw the resolution hanging on the wall, I realized it should be in UC," Somers said. A 1953 graduate in Maths and Physics, Somers is presently employed as a scientific officer by the Canadian Armament Research and Development Establishment in Quebec.

The certificates are for different subjects, and date from 1859 to 1863, while Mulock was a student at U of T. They are similar to minor degrees, are written in Latin, and were issued as official report cards.

Prof. Milnes called the documents "an important find," and said "we don't have much material connected with the college that is this early. Anything which will throw light on the early methods of the university is gratefully received."

"Mr. Somers was most generous in his gift," Prof. Milnes said. "People tend to forget archives between centennial celebrations, but they are important."

The material came to light in a small store on Queen St., "The Collector's Center" specializing in old documents.

"We feel there is a great deal of material relating to early university days hidden in attics all over Canada," Prof. Milnes said.

Bolivia, Jamaica Picked For Student Seminars

Canadian representatives at a Latin American study seminar to be held in Bolivia this May are being sought by the National Federation of Canadian University Students.

The three-week seminar, second of a series, will study social, economic and university problems on national, regional and international levels.

Officials say complete knowledge of the Spanish language is indispensable, and candidates should be available for the entire period of preparation for the seminar as well as the holding of it, from about April 15 to May 24.

Application forms are available from the SAC office and must be submitted by Jan. 20.

A similar seminar is to be held this summer in Jamaica sponsored by the Canadian and West Indian World University Service National Committees.

Delegates will discuss "The West Indies in Transition; Implications of Self-Government."

About 45 delegates from nearly every Canadian university will represent Canada at the seminar, the tenth annual WUS International Seminar.

$4,000 To U of T Men

Canadian Industries Limited has announced it has awarded two fellowships to doctorate students in chemistry at the U of T.

K. J. Macleod, of Windsor, and Kurt Enns, of Kitchener, were among the 15 Canadian students awarded the $2,000 CIL fellowships.

Each award carries with it a maintenance grant at the university.

TV At Pacifist Debate Here

McGill University debaters Sunday defended "a new case for pacifism" against a U of T team here before Canadian Broadcasting Corporation radio-television cameras and microphones.

McGill debaters Norman May and Roy Heenan, both law students, were seen live on the CBC-TV program "Citizens' Forum" as they thrashed out the pacifism issue with Toronto students Malcolm Wallace, I UC, and Sidney Peck, II law.

The program will be rebroadcast Thursday over CBC radio.

A house vote, which saw a filled house uphold the McGill team and pacifism, was not broadcast.

Opening the debate for the Ayes, McGill student May said, "For the first time in man's history he is capable of completely and utterly destroying himself."

"War has become obsolete," he said. "Even the idea of a limited war is inconceivable," he added, because it assumes a nation will refrain from using its most powerful weapons "even on the very verge of destruction."

Leading off for the Noes, Peck said an agreement to abolish war does not constitute pacifism.

But he opposed the idea of unilateral disarmament. "It is our duty," he said, "to defend and cherish" democracy.

"If the Soviet Union did not fear that an attack would be met," Peck said, "they would attack."

Heenan scored "brinkmanship" as a means of foreign policy. He called it a system of bluffing, "based on fear."

"Because nobody knows when a nation will back up its threats," he said, "you could risk the destruction of mankind."

"Our policy would establish trust," he said. If the West ceased nuclear weapons production "even unilaterally," he said, "we believe an atmosphere of trust could be developed."

Wallace, giving the final formal Toronto argument, said he did not fear the total annihilation of mankind because neutral countries such as India would escape nuclear bombardment.

"Even a war fought without nuclear weapons," he said, "is a horrible thing."

"If we give up atomic weapons," Wallace added, "we believe the Russians will take us over."

The TV program ended with audience questions. An additional 15 minutes of audience discussion were recorded for Thursday's three-quarter-hour radio transcribed broadcast.

New CUP Constitution President Now Permanent

After 21 years of growing pains the Canadian University Press came of age last week.

The student press organization emerged from a three-day conference in Winnipeg Dec. 29-31, with a new constitution, a full-time paid president for the first time in its history, and a new national headquarters.

Elected the student press' first full-time president was Doug Parkinson, chairman of McMaster University's Board of Publications and former editor of McMaster's student newspaper, "The Silhouette".

Parkinson will take over his full-time duties next September. Until that time he will continue on a part-time basis in the same way as have previous national executives.

Parkinson's salary would be paid by a grant from each of the 23 universities represented in CUP.

The grant will be calculated at a rate of five cents per student.

Toronto's share of the load, which will not have to be paid until next fall, would be $700.

Tied in with the creation of the presidency was the transferring of all CUP files and archives, as well as the national treasury, to the offices of the National Federation of Canadian University Students in Ottawa.

At present CUP's records, except for the treasury, are kept by the executive paper. The treasury has been permanently established at Queen's University, Kingston.

New president Mortimer Bistrisky, present at the conference as an observer, said the student federation, would be willing to let CUP use its offices as an administrative centre.

Basis for the re-orientation of the student press organization was a revision of the constitution to enlarge CUP's purpose nominally the provision of a national press service to the provision of the press service and the promotion of the standards of student journalism.

The entire executive was also re-vamped at the same time.

Jean-Louis Gagnon, assistant editor of Montreal's "La Presse", was elected honorary president for the coming year.

M. Gagnon succeeds Miles Purcell of Toronto, head of the Canadian Press, in the position.

Members of a newly-created consulting committee include: Dave Grant of the "Argosy Weekly" (Mount Allison University) for the Atlantic region; Pierre Martin of "Le Quatrième Latin" (U of Montreal) in Quebec; Andy Osler of "The Western Gazette" (UWO) representing Ontario; and Kerry Feltham of "The Ubyssy" (UBC) for the western region.

Heb Hamilton of Queen's University was re-elected treasurer, and "Le Carabin" of Laval University was appointed host paper for the 1959 convention, to be held in Quebec City next December.

A prominent feature of the non-business sessions of the conference was a panel discussion by Winnipeg newspaper men concerning some of the problems of Canadian press, both student and professional.

Panel members were: W. H. Metcalfe, managing editor of "The Free Press"; Eric Wells, managing editor of "The Tribune"; and Gene Telpner and Joseph Gelson, Free Press staff writers.

The 65-delegates to the conference spent most of the remainder of their time discussing various aspects of student journalism in rather loosely-organized gatherings.

CUP Trophies For Western And McGill

University of Western Ontario and McMaster University newspapers last week were named the best in their fields in Canada.

The Western Gazette won the Southam Trophy as the best paper publishing twice-weekly or more frequently.

Editor Bob Stamp accepted the award at the annual Canadian University Press awards banquet in the Fort Garry Hotel in Winnipeg.

McMaster University Silhouette was awarded the Jacques Bureau Trophy for general excellence in papers publishing less than twice-weekly.

Editor Ted Johnston accepted the award from CUP President John Gray of The Varsity. Both papers won the awards for the second consecutive year.

The Bracken Trophy for editorials was won by editor Gord Wasserman of the McGill Daily, while the Le Droit Trophy was awarded Le Quatrième Latin of the University of Montreal, judged the best French-language newspaper.

Later in the conference, at the final business session, President Gray was presented with an engraved gavel as a tribute to "his unceasing efforts on behalf of the Canadian University Press."

Laval Expels Student Journalist CUP Supports Ottawa Alumnus

Another act in the long drawn-out drama of the La Rotonde controversy was played out over the Christmas holidays.

One of the two editors who constituted the first wave of the editorial firings on the University of Ottawa's student newspaper has been expelled from another university because of his continued participation in the affair.

Normand Lacharite was told by the administration of Laval University in Quebec City that he had been expelled for writing an article in Laval's newspaper, Le Carabin, strongly criticizing the paternalism of the Oblate Fathers, the religious order which runs U of O.

Lacharite and Jean David were fired from the editorial board of La Rotonde last spring when they published an article criticizing the university administration.

Three other student editors were fired early this fall after they had printed a post-mortem report by Lacharite.

Since that time La Rotonde, normally a bi-weekly, has published only once — a special election broadsheet, edited by a special committee mandated for the occasion.

The election, held Friday, Dec. 11, resulted in Louis Cléhe, one of the trio fired this fall, being elected president of the university's student federation.

The first letter Lacharite received from the Laval administration asked him for an explanation of his intentions in writing the article entitled "Le Camelot des Oblates."

He replied, stating his reasons for writing the article, and ended his letter with the expression "mille excuses."

The next letter curtly informed him he was expelled.

Lacharite then wrote the rector asking for a review of his case and a chance to appear before the university's disciplinary board so that he could plead his own case.

The answer stated the review had been made and the decision to expel him remained unchanged.

It continued: "The board will itself decide whom it wants to meet."

Lacharite, who has applied to several other universities for admittance, was not granted the hearing.

At the Canadian University Press conference in Winnipeg, Lacharite, attending as the representative of Ontario regional vice-president Jean David, explained his case to the conference.

The constitution of the AGEF (the Laval students' Federation) says that it alone has the right to hire and fire editors, and that it is responsible for all material printed in the paper," he said.

"This constitution has been accepted by the administration — and my expulsion thus constitutes a direct contravention of the freedom of the press," he said.

The CUP passed a resolution strongly condemning the Laval university administration's contravention of the freedom of the press in the case of Normand Lacharite.

News that the Soviet has jacked a little bit of Russia more than three hundred thousand miles into interplanetary space ignites weird conflicts of emotions in our soul.

On the one hand we are inspired. Here we have positive proof that man is no longer the prisoner of his environment, the eternal ward of his mother Earth. Man has assured himself that he can make the last great leap into the unknown and the glory of the universe, dangerous yet inviting, is waiting to receive him.

The other reaction to the Russian achievement is one of fear—fear colder than the steel-blue atmosphere we have riddled with our toy rockets.

The fear is caused by the fundamental realization that we cannot as yet speak grandly of such universal conceptions as "man". The human race is still an amalgamation of particulars; and the particulars are very much opposed to each other.

Not only have the Russians established a foothold for new discovery with their rocket, they have also revealed that they hold a royal flush in the political poker game which nation plays against nation. The 3,000 ton artificial planet now orbiting the sun is a symbol of victory in a thirteen-year race for supremacy and it introduces a chilling theme to the music of the spheres.

These then are the two conflicting emotions: a renaissance-like excitement at man's accomplishment coupled with the frightening knowledge that it was accomplished by the wrong sort of man.

The reasons why we lost the race would seem to be inherent in our two societies. It becomes increasingly obvious that the West is weakened by complacency and a desire for the comforts of life while Russia, with her eyes on the future, is sacrificing her standards of living for the sake of the state as a whole.

In these terms it seems meaningless to talk about the western democracies re-establishing that same resolute spirit which once made them great. Such determination, where it existed, was a product of more selfish values than the present situation demands. Somehow we must adapt ourselves to the same hard, strict and indefatigable patterns set by the Communists.

Almost by definition, the resolute spirit the democracies need so badly only emerges when we are actually committed to, or involved in, war. Not all the sad examples of history will ever convince us our rights are in danger until the first shot is fired, or move us to that iron-hard determination until our first brother dies.

Our generation has grown up with warnings ringing in its ears. The warnings have ceased to be vague. We will not, as we once believed, always win. Now, and possibly for many years to come, we will almost certainly lose.

At the moment many people in the West are hopefully waiting for a miracle to rise majestically from the sandy shores of Cape Canaveral. We very much doubt that it will ever do so.

More farsighted people are searching our universities for the material which might make such a miracle possible. There is little to reward them under our present systems. The genius which combines to hike a freight train into outer space is either discouraged or never allowed to express itself in our democratic institutions.

Democracy is wonderful when it's by itself—even if it does tend to become synonymous with mediocrity. But totalitarian regimes can only be properly challenged by totalitarian methods. To compete against that power which we truly believe will destroy our rights we must have authoritarian and ruthless leadership. Our system must be flexible enough to sacrifice our comforts for the sake of survival. We must choose for ourselves an executive with the courage of its ultimate convictions and the strength to govern firmly despite the tides of popularity. We must, if necessary, become ugly to destroy ugliness.

For until man has thus mastered himself, fear will never be separated from the thrill of his own achievements.

... "my message is a feeble one . . . Peace on earth, goodwill to men" . . .

At Winnipeg's Canadian University Press Conference last week, Tom Kent, editor of the Liberal Winnipeg Free Press, gave a brilliant exposition of how a newspaper must mix responsibility with its power.

Mr. Kent's speech to student journalists from 23 Canadian universities was unfortunately marred by stern editorial prejudices — mostly directed at Lord Beaverbrook's Tory newspaper empire — but the primary significance of what he was saying remained clear.

Mr. Kent believes, and he unblushingly cited the Free Press as an example, a newspaper must answer to all levels of society. What it is communicating must be as clear to the executive's secretary as it is to the executive himself.

"A newspaper can't have anything exclusive about it," Mr. Kent said. A meeting ground of opinion is provided in a "newspaper which is at once intelligent and popular, informed but ordinary."

Mr. Kent was well aware he was speaking to a group of undergraduate journalists, notorious for their lack of responsibility. At one point, in an aside, he conceded, a university newspaper could have more freedom, indeed should have more freedom, than ordinary newspapers.

The significance of what Mr. Kent was saying was not lost on the delegates to the CUP conference. Freedom of the press, responsibility, power, good taste and judgment, are all clichés with which they are painfully familiar. All of them, or nearly all, understand it.

What Mr. Kent did not realize was that two of the editors he was speaking to had already lost their posts — one his education — for following the honest principles he advocated. The editors believed in what they were saying and believed their readers deserved to know it. They carried their responsibility to society further than Mr. Kent would ever dare to carry his.

The story of one editor, Normand Lacharite, is reprinted elsewhere in this paper. To most of us it does not make very pleasant reading.

No, Mr. Kent, university editors are not as unenlightened as you seem to think. They do "rush in where angels and philosophers fear to tread", farther than you yourself would tread. Most of them unpaid, they accept their responsibilities honestly. Rather than losing a job they risk losing a university career, and few of them risk it lightly.

At the same time they are in a fortunate position in relation to their readers. They need not — as you must — pay some enviling tribute to their publishers. They can and do criticize freely where criticism is needed. They owe no adherence to some vested interest, some political ideal.

For these reasons, and many, many others, the university press has earned a reputation for freedom and responsibility to its readers which professional newspapers in this country envy. If the Liberal party stinks, they will say so; instead of erecting false damnations upon the Conservatives.

Your speech was important, Mr. Kent, important because now we will know how to behave when we move into the tough world of big journalism. Meanwhile be condescending about professional standards, yes, but don't try to tell us about principles.

Canadian Poets in Penguin Anthology

Anthologies of Canadian poetry are necessarily more than collections of poems. They are, by their very existence, selections made in accordance with implicit principles. Only recently have these been established with any degree of permanence. The result is a better understanding of our poetic predecessors but, along with that, a less tolerant appreciation of contemporary writers—although the tendency now is to be intolerant of important but peripheral poets in order to produce handbooks of genuine "Canadiana" under 255 pages.

The most recent example of this is "The Penguin Book of Canadian Verse", introduced and edited by Ralph Gustafson, which sells for 70 cents. It begins with two genuine anonymous indigenous native songs, Wabanaki and Eskimo, labours through the Heavysege's Mair's, Lampton's, Campbell's and Scott's, ending with an imposing trio of young practitioners, Jay Macpherson, Leonard Cohen and Daryl Hine. A total of 63 writers are included, being represented by 3.5 poems each—hardly representative of either trend or talent, although fewer writers and more poems would scarcely be the solution to the problem.

The editor, Ralph Gustafson, is of course a poet, too. In 1942 he edited a similar selection called "Anthology of Canadian Poetry (English)" for Penguin Books which contained half the number of poems but only 8 fewer poets. The passage of time has shown Gustafson's first effort to be a rather insular expression of poor assessment. For instance the post is poorly represented, with no Heavysege Sangster or Mair, and there are noticeably bad leads with the ten contemporary poets, Joseph Schull, Noyes, Laight and Allan Brown. Gustafson himself is represented by an abnormally large number of poems, none of which he thought enough of to reprint in his second anthology!

Compared with an outside source, the third edition of A. J. M. Smith's "The Book of Canadian Poetry", Gustafson's choice is still seen to be unsettled, although in order to edit this better collection, Smith had to resort to twice the number of pages at nine times the cost!

Smith and Gustafson are best shown to be at odds in the case of Robert Finch, who is with UC's Department of French. Gustafson represents him with five poems, Smith with eight. They agree on three. But Gustafson's other two, "Jardin" and "Alone", are definitely poor seconds, compared with Smith's "Egg-and-Dart" and "Over". In the case of another contemporary, the Montreal poet living Layton, there is only one of Gustafson's choices which is indispensable, that being "The Birth of Tragedy", with the rest being second rate, compared to Smith's selection.

Both editors, however, seem well grounded in the classical Canadian poets. Lampton and Roberts are done justice, but Carman's short lyrics have been ignored in place of the dubious five-page poem "A Seamark". Neither anthologist has seen fit to reprint at least part of Earl Birney's "David", perhaps the most important single Canadian poem. But it is Gustafson who has finally restored Knister's "The Plowman" by including the original's final three lines.

The only other feature of Gustafson's anthology to comment upon is its introduction. But, on second thought, its beat-generation, present-tense, clipped, jargonish style speaks for itself. This stands in marked contrast to Smith's often-plodding but always illuminating divisions and discoveries. Strange that both of these Canadian-born anthologist-poets live as expatriates in the U.S.A. and that one must publish with an English firm and the other receive Guggenheim Awards in order to edit at all!

Happily most of these points are technical. "The Penguin Book of Canadian Verse" deserves the popularity its pocket form is certain to win for it. But the purchaser should bear in mind that nothing of the French-Canadian tradition is represented and that there are a few serious oversights, which would easily be rectified by more hindsight, these being the ignoring of Robert Norwood, Pauline Johnson, Wilson MacDonald and Robert Service—the last being worth more than two handfuls each of Bertram Warr's, Phyllis Webb's, Eldon Grier's, Norman Levine's and W. W. E. Ross's.

concert band to start

Attention all those that bang, blow, twang, scrape (or try to squeeze a noise from) an instrument! Here at last is your chance to let off all those pent-up emotions in the form of an instrumental noise in a Concert Band.

Up until now there has been a great vacuum in campus musical activities, but this deplorable state of affairs is about to be rectified with the inauguration of a Concert Band on Wednesday, under the direction of Paul Brodie and Eldon Lehman.

Both these conductors are very talented men, and with their inspiration and drive, and expert leadership the concert band should prove to be a very worth while project. Paul Brodie is himself a concert saxophonist, and studied with the famous French virtuoso, Marcel Mule, who is professor of saxophone at the Paris Conservatoire. A graduate of the University of Michigan, with a Masters degree in music, Mr. Brodie has recently come to the Toronto Conservatory to instruct saxophone. He is already taking an active part in the musical life of Toronto, and can be heard on the radio on Sunday, when he will be giving a saxophone recital on CBL at 10.30 a.m. with works by Cor-elli, Handel, Tcheraprine, Bozza and Crisler. Eldon Lehman is teaching the trumpet at the Royal Conservatory, and is also involved in theatrical and symphonic activities in the city.

Anyone who possesses an instrument, or who is interested in playing one in a concert band should go to the basement of the Sir Daniel Wilson residence on Wednesday afternoon from 4-6 p.m. The first meeting will be a general get together, and the plans for the band and its organization will be outlined. Auditions will be held at a later date. Everybody should take a music stand to the meeting.

ELEPHANTIASIS

Near the start of the Roots of Heaven, now showing at the Hollywood, Juliette Greco leans sensuously across her counter and asks Trevor Howard, "How long have you felt this way about elephants?"

The question sounds ridiculous, and it should, but the ridiculousness should be used to point up the pathos that underlies it. The Roots of Heaven never quite rises to that pathos. The story, for all its paradoxes, is about a hero-saint. The movie turns it into a patronizing parable about a lovable but irresponsible crackpot. The movie is weaker than its material to the extent that pity is weaker than love.

Trevor Howard, shocked by the irresponsible slaughter of elephants in Africa, circulates a petition for the safeguarding of elephants and an end to their slaughter for the profit in ivory. To him the elephants symbolize a freedom and peace he has not found among men. He is sooner or later forced into hiding with a group of followers, from where he carries out a lawless campaign to protect the elephants. With him are his lady love, Juliette Greco, and a cynical American press photographer Eddie Albert. During a stampede most of his followers are killed by elephant hunters.

The few that are left start a trek to get Miss Greco to a hospital, a trek that by its close is transformed into a tremendous Gandhian pilgrimage, when natives line up behind the feeble marchers. With Miss Greco safely in the hospital, Howard and company return to the desert. Eddie Albert is still with them, but he now throws away his cameras.

Why does he throw away his cameras? Why is the attention of the whole world focussed on this man who loves elephants? The movie never makes it clear.

Early in the movie, Howard brings his petition to the priest of the town. The priest will not sign. He thinks man is more important than elephants. This seems like a reasonable point of view. And later, as if to prove him right, the whole adventure begins to look like a pretty futile business. The point that the movie must make is the point that the priest has missed, but unfortunately the director seems to have missed it too.

To succeed the film must tell us what Eddie Albert saw that made him throw away the symbol of his objective detachment. And when the natives line up behind Howard, what are they lining up behind?

Obviously it has nothing to do with elephants, as such. Howard's fight for the elephants is simply an act of human decency. Part of what the movie says is that any act of decency and love, no matter to what it is directed, has a tremendous worth in itself. This is also the point in the trek to the hospital, which on any other other interpretation seems meaningless. The world looks to Howard because the world is crying out for an act of love, even toward elephants.

Mistakes in pace, mistakes in emphasis, mistakes in characterization can all be reduced to a lack of love in the making of the film. Director John Huston, one of the best directors working today seems to have gone at the movie with an unaccountable "let's get it over with quickly" attitude. The acting is fair in most cases, except in Howard's. Much of the time he seems to be giving an imitation of Robert Newton.

But The Roots of Heaven is still an important movie. The experience it offers has to be dug out of some poor craftsmanship, but if the attempt is made, and if the viewer opens himself to it, it is an experience of saintly beauty, profound love, and pressing meaningfulness.

A Review of a Revue

Concerning the Crest Theatre's first affair with a revue, currently being presented, not a great deal can be said except that in some places it is quite funny, but mostly it isn't.

"This is our first affair," lacks any theme, which is probably a virtue, and the title refers only to the fact that the Crest has not previously attempted a revue.

At its best, the revue is fast moving, the various acts are brief enough to prevent monotony setting in with any permanence. The main complaint against the effort is that it seems to have been thrown together pretty hastily, the quality is terribly uneven and the music extremely mediocre throughout.

Jane Mallett who, the program notes explain, is a veteran of many years of revue work, vaguely spearheads the Crest production of an apparently pointless musical soliloquy which was nearly inaudible last Friday. She continues to creep up throughout the show usually in the fairly funny role of a "little old lady."

Big-name in the show is CBC's Phyllis Marshall whose glamorous body is displayed generously in a couple of skits, one of which — "Brother Jose" — is perhaps the best musical piece in the revue.

Ezra Gavon, a comparative newcomer to the Crest, shines forth if for no other reason than his enthusiasm, a quality many of the other performers — Corinne Conley, Joseph Shaw, Meg Walters, and John Baylis — seem frequently to lack.

Mon Oncle — M. Hulot

I suppose that a lot of paying customers who presumably laughed themselves silly at the inspired lunacies of M. HULOT'S HOLIDAY may be slightly disappointed by the so-called sequel, Jacques Tati's MON ONCLE, now playing at the Towne Cinema. However, that considerably smaller group of cineasts, who are capable of distinguishing light comedy from bedroom farce will come away from this film filled with a sombre, profound and paradoxical joy.

Tatisseff, a unique personality in the French cinema, is a poet, and as a poet, it is his business to suggest rather than to clarify — thus the seemingly inexplicable shots of dogs going about their business through the city at the beginning and end of the film.

Tati has been compared to Chaplin in his comic style; perhaps in many respects he is closer to Buster Keaton. He is an individualist caught in the complexities of everyday life, and unlike Chaplin, he never emerges victorious from the struggle, nor like Keaton, does he ever appear completely oblivious to what is happening to him. Rather, he regards every occurrence, even the simplest, with a sort of owl's amazement.

Some critics have called Tati a catalyst, a figure who is not funny in himself, but simply creates funny situations; one look at this hulking figure with the peculiar walk and almost chronic lack of anything even faintly approaching human speech, should be enough to dispell such easy generalizations. It is precisely because Hulot is so funny in himself that the situations become funny; the fact that a particularly revolting living-room couch has to be overturned to provide a comfortable resting place is not terribly humorous in itself; the fact that it is Hulot who has overturned it in order to get some sleep points up the humour very effectively.

There are faults with MON ONCLE, in some cases quite glaring ones. There is far too much dialogue, and as Tati himself considers the spoken word unimportant, this means that there are long passages of conversation which do not even serve to advance the exposition of the plot. Moreover, the humor of Hulot's encounters with the mechanical marvels of his sister's home lose much of their punch, because Hulot is baffled even by the simplest things in life, and the fact that he is completely baffled by modern gadgets comes as no surprise.

But these faults, apart, MY ONCLE is a very enjoyable and very funny film. And judging from the fact that the Towne Cinema is scheduling FRENCH CAN-CAN as its next attraction, we can only hope that this movie house is at long last sick and tired of long-runs.

Lockhart In Toronto, No Plans

Principal Felt "Power Plays"

Dr. W. C. Lockhart, former principal of Winnipeg's United College, said in Toronto Saturday that the series of events which culminated in his resignation almost seemed like "a series of power plays against me."

Lockhart quit his post after a letter from Prof. Harry Crowe was intercepted and put in his hands by unknown persons; Crowe was dismissed by the College's Board of Regents and a national furor arose.

Dr. Lockhart said here he believed Winnipeg police were satisfied that the letter from Crowe, at Queen's University at the time, had not reached Prof. W. A. Packer for whom it was intended.

Dr. Lockhart said he had no idea who had forwarded the letter to him, but added it was possible that a trap had been intended.

Exact contents of the letter have not been revealed, but Dr. Lockhart said it contained derogatory statements about religion and about certain ministers.

Although Dr. Lockhart had photostats made of the letter, he denied that he used it to bring about the firing of Crowe by the Board of Regents in September.

Crowe was reinstated at the college last month.

Dr. Lockhart said that he believed only a judicial inquiry into the matter could resolve it.

"I don't think we can ever get at the truth until there is full-scale investigation," he said. He advocated an inquiry at which persons could be "put under oath and evidence taken in a recognized legal manner."

The principal said he was shocked at the manner in which an investigation of the matter was carried out by a committee of the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

"To an outsider as far east as Toronto," he said, "some of it might appear to have had a soap opera touch, but to get innocently mixed up in it all was a sad experience," he said.

Dr. Lockhart explained that for the former principal of United College, the possibility that the letter put in his hands and which started an uproar that led to his resignation in a "power play" might have been a trap still remains . . .

once the letter was in front of him; he could not have ignored it since the anonymous person who sent it to him could then have informed the Board of Regents that he was concealing important information about the attitude of a faculty member toward the college and its religion.

"No matter what I did with the letter," he said, "I probably would have been accused of doing wrong."

Dr. Lockhart denied there was any such thing as "thought control" at the college. He said he never insisted faculty members subscribe to any religious belief.

He said he was aware of a difference of opinion among the faculty concerning the college's building drive and that some thought it was taking money away that might be used for raising staff salaries.

"I have had a clear-cut policy of raising staff salaries," he said. Three years ago, professors were paid $5,500, while today they receive $8,500.

Dr. Lockhart said he has no plans for the future.

Castro Seen As Deliverer Bursary Values Down For Some

In the hotel we learned of the general strike. Pretty soon, we learned, there would be no stores in the city, because no food would be open.

We bought some sandwiches to have the next day.

If we'd listened to what the Canadian consul told us, we'd still be in Cuba. When we phoned him, he told us there was no way of leaving the city. We could only stay indoors and wait, he told us. We were worried about getting back to Toronto in time for school.

During the night, Marvin was awakened by firing nearby. He thought he heard bombs going off somewhere.

The next day the streets were completely barricaded. We saw Castro's bearded soldiers enter the city in open trucks.

In the streets armed civilians with armbands patrolled to keep order. The sound of machine guns was everywhere.

We talked to the Canadian consul again, and he told us we still could not leave Cuba. But meanwhile, we had heard that a sea-going ferry, the S.S. City of Havana, was being prepared to evacuate Americans.

With armed civilians guarding the streets, we made it to the American consulate and stood in line. We got two of the 10 remaining tickets for the ship.

We went back to the Nacional after we had packed. People there had not eaten since the day before. Sandwiches were being sold for $3 each.

At 4 p.m. an armed convoy led by open cars bristling with armed Cuban revolutionaries arrived at the hotel to take us to the docks. There were 14 cars driven by American soldiers to drive us.

All the way to the dock, the streets were lined with cheering Castro supporters mostly wearing six-guns.

By the time we were loaded on the ship and had gone through immigrations, it was 9 p.m. As we pulled out of Havana, a huge fire was burning in the city. It seemed to be a building burning, but we never learned for sure.

On the ship there were 500 of us. We slept on the decks on our life-jackets and there was so little food, people broke into the restaurant and emptied it during the night.

A lot had happened in two days and we were glad to be out of Cuba.

On the morning of Dec. 29 we had flown from Miami, Fla., to Havana. We knew there was fighting in Oriente province, but we never guessed it would come so close to us.

In Havana we saw the Cuban people at work and at play. We saw the slum sections of the city where garbage littered the narrow streets and the rich playing in the casinos.

We saw the presidential palace, and when one of us raised a camera to photograph it, a guard aimed his rifle at us.

A young Cuban, a middle-class businessman told us that when Fidel Castro came — and he would come — the Cuban people would be liberated. He told us Batista was a dictator who was wasting the wealth of his country.

But another time, a Cuban cab-driver became almost hysterical when we mentioned Castro. It was none of our business, he told us, and people who mentioned Castro in Havana were frequently shot.

But generally, we got the impression that the people were for Castro. What he wanted, they wanted.

The night before the revolution hit, we went to see a cock-fight. As we were walking along the Prado Boulevard at 3 a.m., three speeding secret police cars passed us. Later we were told this was Batista fleeing the country.

On the ship back to Key West, we met a university student from New York who had been shot in the arm while the looting was going on. We also met a lawyer who had been above an apartment that was machine-gunned by Castro's supporters.

When we got to Key West, there was a band there to meet us. We got a drive to Miami where our car was and drove to Toronto.

Dominion-Provincial bursaries to university students in senior years have been sliced this year, a Department of Education official said yesterday.

"Students in third or fourth year university are nearer their earning power and can make use of the new Provincial Student-Aid Loan Fund," the official said.

"This leaves more money left over for students in junior years."

Reason for the cut was mainly increased enrolments. Secondary causes were lack of summer jobs and the numbers of strikes throughout the province, the official said.

"We had more applications than ever before," she said.

The province is granted $55,000 by the federal government. The bursaries are awarded to other applicants besides university students.

The official said the fund had been increased this year. The loan fund was inaugurated last spring to aid students further.

Loans are granted for $500 a year with a maximum of $2,000. They are interest free until the April following graduation and then at four per cent.

The education official said large numbers of students were making use of the loan fund.

OAC Men Report On Cuba

Guelph (CUP) — Two students of the Ontario Agricultural College said last night that Cuban ex-president Batista's failure to interest himself in the welfare of the peasants was one of the main reasons for his downfall.

The students, David Stager of Smithville, and Kenneth Smith, of Waterford, left Cuba two days before the revolutionary forces of Fidel Castro stormed into Havana and forced Batista to flee the country.

"The people down there look forward to a change in government," Stager said, "but they don't have an election. They stage a revolution."

"There is little evidence that the Communists are behind this revolt," he continued, "but it is evident they are cashing in on the publicity."

News Snaps

Open Meetings Again

The possibility that open meetings of the University College Literary and Athletic Society might be abolished was ruled out last night by Vice President Jane Weber.

"The only question brought up at an open meeting last term was concerned with changing the time of the meetings due to poor attendance," Miss Weber said.

The question will be discussed at a closed executive meeting today, and it is probable that the time will be changed from 4 p.m. to 1 p.m., and that the meetings will be held in the Women's Union instead of the Junior Common Room, she said.

"There was never any question of abolishing the meetings," she said.

Group of Five Again . . .

University of Toronto's controversial artists' group is on the move again.

Ladd Vormitag, president of the Group of Five which was apparently extinct before Christmas, said yesterday the clique is re-organizing and plans a "trail-blazing series of meetings in the near future to prove the spirit of the artist, unorthodox and brave still persists."

Vormitag also said the membership of the club is not limited to five as the name implies. "Nevertheless," he added, "we must be careful who we allow to join us."

"All we demand," he said, "is a true and creative interest in the potentialities of the soul as it exists today."

He said that first on the Group's list of activities will be an attempt to induce critic Nathan Cohen to address one of their seminars.

UC By Floodlight

Thirteen bright new orange floodlights are nightly gleaming on the University College front lawn.

Assistant Superintendent of buildings and grounds Alec Russell yesterday said the lights, installed near the end of last term are one facet of an overall plan to beautify the buildings and flower plots on campus.

The lights, focusing on UC, are to serve a dual purpose, Mr. Russell said. Besides highlighting the College's architecture they will complement the horticultural displays.

An early start is forecast on these beds. Tulips will be planted in such profusion as to rival former years, Mr. Russell said.

Plans have been drawn up for new gardens in front of the Library and Medical Buildings. Attempts will be made to integrate the displays with the distinctive features of many of the buildings on campus.

White lights, which formerly illuminated the front of the Bookstore have been removed.

HE SHOOT, HE SCORES—Varsity winger Dunc Brodie blasts a high drive past Whitby goaltender John Henderson. This was one of three goals for Brodie as Blues edged the world champions 6-5 in Varsity Arena December 17. Varsity travels to Kingston Saturday for a game with the CKLC's.

Gene Glisky Comments Belatedly On A Great Ice Game Of 1958

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

It's old copy now—Varsity Blues edged Whitby Dunlops 6-5 at Varsity Arena Dec. 17.

And all who were interested have seen the old, cold statistics calmly showing Dunc Brodie scoring three goals and gaining two assists, Ray Dunn blocking 51 shots, Howie "Li'l B'ar" Roth scoring unassisted, and Ron Casey and Red Stephen combining for the winning goal.

Time will alter the memory of these numbers. Exact scores and plays will become confused, exaggerated, and forgotten.

But never in a lifetime can one forget the roar of three thousand voices chanting "GO BLUES GO". The sight of fifteen college boys, weary, and bruised but with all the heart and courage in the world, will live on and on.

And the bewildered look on the faces of veteran pros in the Dummies' lineup is worthy of memory. In this systematic, calculating age, hockey just isn't played this way.

A player knocked down and out just doesn't bounce up and away to score a goal. An athlete with a drugged ankle, and limping badly, is not supposed capable of scoring a hat-trick in an exhibition game. A goalie with only three men up front to protect him, is not expected to kick and catch, fall upon and practically "eat" the puck to prevent a score.

Perhaps in the leagues of under-the-counter honus cheques and contracts, trades and waivers, majors and minors, things aren't done this way, but then until recently, Varsity Blues weren't in the picture.

It wasn't the eventual victory that seems so important. The game could have gone either way. It was the manner in which Blues played it, the spirit that pervaded the whole arena, and is so difficult to describe, that made this simple contest a memorable occasion.

Every player on the Blues' roster in his own special way, contributed to the victory. It was a rousing, inspired team effort that could not fail to touch every spectator.

A standing ovation, so spontaneous and stirring, Blues deserved through their magnificent display of courage and determination. In the minds of the 3,000 fans, memories of the contest shall never be forgotten.

Affable coach Jack Kennedy deserves sincere congratulations. His work with the squad did much to mold the talent of his players into a truly great competitive team.

Thank you Blues for making us so proud to be associated with the U of T. Thanks again for reviving our faith in hockey, and the spirit of amateur competition. If we wax too enthusiastic, please forgive us. It felt so good to be a kid again. Chuckle!

A brief announcement originating in the snow-covered town of Midland on January 2 spelled S-H-A-T-T-E-R to a vague pipe-dream that had been lulling a few people on the campus to sleep.

George Dudley, secretary-manager of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association, disclosed that Kitchener-Waterloo Dutchmen had been selected to represent Canada in the 1960 Winter Olympics.

The choice was made, after a vote of a five-man special committee of the CAHA—president Robert Lebel, first vice-president Gordon Juckes, second vice-president J. M. Roxburgh, and W. A. Hewitt, long-time registrar-treasurer.

Four teams had applied. Kelowna Packers, Fort William Beavers and the reigning champion Whitby Dunlops were the others. The University of Toronto did not enter an application.

And it's probably just as well.

The CAHA will supply money for living expenses, travel and uniforms. Dutchmen will have to find an estimated $15,000 to cover other expenditures.

That figure is something that U of T wouldn't have, and would likely be rather adverse to soliciting from interested alumni and the other popular fund-raising ventures.

And the Athletic Directorate would not be happy with the way in which the CAHA would deal with the $15,000. It may be the team's money, but Mr. Dudley and his executive would have a great deal of say in just who was on hand to spend it.

The Whitby Dunlops that were selected to represent Canada in the 1958 world championships were a far cry from the team that travelled overseas.

Little did Jean-Paul Lamirande, George Gosselin, Connie Broden, Sid Smith, Roy Edwards and Jack McKenzie realize when the representative was announced that they would be wearing a Dunnie sweater in Oslo a few months hence.

The same juggling would be necessary had the present Varsity Blues been selected to make the trip to Squaw Valley, Calif. next year.

There are, without doubt, some players on the team who would be considered valuable personnel on an Olympic competitor (and when the K-W lineup is settled, we may even see some Blues on it).

But others are not, and they would have to be replaced by players the university would not be particularly interested in supplying with shoulder pads, chewing gum and four sticks a game.

But, it will be said, Varsity Blues defeated Whitby Dunlops, the team that had knocked aside the best bet from every other country in the world.

Aha, do not haste. They were the world champions in name alone when the rafters rose at Varsity Arena back on December 17. Gone were the Brodens, Lamirandes, McKenzies and Gosselins.

Also missing were Charlie Burns, who made the jump to pro play with Detroit Red Wings, Harry Sinden, sidelined with a hand injury, and goalie Roy (Stinky) Edwards, who stopped the Russians cold.

Yes, for those who had dreamed of the Varsity Blues skating out to match brains and brawns with the red-shirted Muscovites, the vision is gone.

Some players from the university team may participate in the 1960 Games, but they will wear the uniform of another team.

And gone will be the resounding echo that told those Varsity players there were 2,500 eager fans solidly behind them as they battled Wren Blair's Dunlops that frigid December night.

Many supporters of the idea to send Blues to the Games are undoubtedly saddened by the CAHA decision. On the contrary, gentlemen, it is a good and wise move that their name was not submitted.

Because the overnight recognition Varsity gained from that 6-5 win over Whitby is far more important to our university than a haphazard collection of college kids, worn-out veterans and elbow-happy guys (who could never quite make the big leagues) playing under a University of Toronto banner at the Olympic Games.

College hockey in Toronto has been given only moderate support in recent years. A great many hockey fans probably didn't even know it existed.

But they do now. And they realize that hockey on our campus (as, indeed, throughout the Intercollegiate league) is worthy of attention.

That recognition contains more potential benefits than a senseless, $15,000 crack at the international, diplomatic cloud that hovers over Olympic hockey championships.

Blues' Bill Yorzyk Sets World Mark

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.—Yorzyk returns to Toronto after (Special) — University of Toronto, swim coach Bill Yorzyk, winner of a gold medal in the 1956 Olympic Games at Melbourne, Australia, and probably American representative at the 1960 Games in Rome, Italy, set a new world record for the 110-yard butterfly event.

Yorzyk and Mike Troy of Indiana University battled to a dead heat in the test during the East-West Collegiate Swim Meet. They chopped eight-tenths of a second off the listed world-mark with a clocking of 1:03.0 minutes.

The twin assault on the record book will be submitted for official recognition as a world mark.

Yorzyk trailed throughout the first lap, but battled back to a dead-heat during the second length of the pool. They touched the wall simultaneously.

In his first year with Varsity, he broke two individual Canadian records, and swam with the university team that established a new mark in the medley relay event.

He succeeded retiring coach Cressy McCarty at the start of the present academic year, and faces a heavy exhibition schedule before the Intercollegiate championships in Montreal in February.

Laval Pair Leaders In Intercol Scoring

With the Intercollegiate hockey season one-quarter over, two members of Laval Rouge et Or continue to hold the top rung in the individual scoring statistics.

Pierre Raymond — now in his fourth year with the team—and Claude Duguay each have nine points. Raymond leads all goal-scorers with six.

Third from the top is Varsity's ace Bill (Bear) Kennedy, with three goals and five assists for eight points. He's tied with University of Montreal's Marcel Landreville and Yves Laurendeau, and Laval's Lorne Arseneault.

Montreal captain Maurice Duhaime has six points, making the Carabins' Landreville - Laurendeau-Duhaime trio the top-scoring unit in the league to date.

McGill Redmen defenceman Terry Dingle is off to a flying start as the league's badman, having spent 25 minutes in the penalty box in three games. Team-mate Mike Richards is second with 20.

Carabins' agile goaltender Pierre Schooner tops the net-minders with a sparkling 1.5 average in two games. Schooner blanked McGill, 13-0, and allowed three goals as Varsity topped Montreal, 3-0, in the last game before Christmas.

Three other goalies are close behind. Varsity's Bob Giroux, Laval's Jacques Lebrun and Blues' Ray Dunn are all below the 3.5 goals-against mark.

Blues will be out to improve their scoring records a week from Friday when they entertain the hapless McGill crew in the first game of the New Year.

Re: The Varsity Student Mirror Reports Pre-game McGill Hoax

An international student publication has joined the ranks of those duped by a McGill Daily gag involving The Varsity.

The Student Mirror, published by the International Student Conference, said in its December issue that The Varsity was "in serious trouble" after the Students' Administrative Council supported an order by President Claude T. Bissell dissolving the paper and dismissing its editors.

The story was picked up from a gag issue published by the McGill Daily before a McGill-U of T football game in Toronto. The issue was to have been distributed on the U of T campus, but a shipment of 2,000 issues was delayed in transit and arrived too late for distribution.

The story was retracted in the Daily's next issue, but several publications missed the denial and printed the story.

Describing the "stormy 3½-hour

SAC session," the Mirror said the meeting "almost flared into violence" before a majority of members supported the presidential order.

The Daily alerted all member papers of Canadian University Press except The Varsity that the story was a hoax.

Only Canadian paper to be taken in by the hoax was Assumption University's Purple and White which does not belong to CUP. Wire services and national newspapers which picked up the story checked with The Varsity before they printed it, and discovered the gag.

70 Universities Meet For Lima Conference

Student representatives of about 70 universities met in Lima, Peru Feb. 15-25 for the eighth International Student Conference—the largest meeting of the organization so far in history.

Host of the meeting, the first to be held in the Western hemisphere, will be the Federation of Peruvian Students which has contacted all Peruvian students requesting their support of the event.

In the letter sent to Peruvian students, the FPS stated that "the conference does not follow any of those ideological currents which are dividing the world today, in whose conflicts the students of Peru have not taken and do not want to take any part."

After the conference, this February, the Coordinating Secretariat of National Unions of Students supervises the carrying out of mandates received from the conference.

elects by the conference controls the work of the secretariat, the conference's permanent administrative office.

Because of the conditions of autonomy regarding each national students' union participating in the conferences, each one is invited annually to the meeting and is not bound by any decisions of the conference.

Former conferences held in Stockholm, Copenhagen, Edinburgh, Birmingham, Istanbul, Ceylon and Nigeria were attended by national unions from America, Asia, Africa, Europe and Australasia.

Canadian delegate to the conference will be Mortimer Bistrisky, president of the National Federation of Canadian University Students.

WUS Sales Set Record

Treasure Van sales across Canada may set a new record this year.

The University of Toronto leads sales reported with a total of $5,256. The University of Alberta is second with $4,947 reported.

World University Service which sponsors the tour receives 25% of the proceeds to aid students around the world. Treasure Van keeps the balance for operating expenses.

WUS officials attributed Treasure Van's success this year to the addition of material from Peru, Brazil and Thailand.

But what pleases me most is the Bell's plan to give me a broad base of experience — and the way this plan is now being followed! "For the first three months I worked with a Commercial Representative visiting customers' premises, both business and residential. Top CCFer Defects Party Joins Liberals For Session After Ideological Conflict

DEMBSKI

The campus CCF party lost one of its three top men to the Liberals last night.

Former CCF vice-president Peter Dembski quit the party on ideological grounds and says he will sit on the Liberal bench during next week's Model Parliament session.

In a press statement Dembski said it seemed inevitable to him socialism "would submerge the individual to the point of oblivion".

"The concept of a socialist society includes acceptance of the belief that man's will can be formed for good by the government of that society."

Dembski said such a view contradicts the idea that "all good or virtue must ultimately proceed from the individual's will".

The second-year St. Mike's student said the Liberal party presented the best available outlet for the expression of his ideas and ideals.

CCF president Jerry Caplan last night praised Dembski's sincerity.

"I know he's done it honestly and he's done it through a lot of reading and thinking. I respect him for his decision", Caplan said.

He said he thought Dembski's initial joining of the CCF was "a little impetuous. When he dug into it a bit he found things which were a little incompatible".

Asked if he thought the defection would hurt the CCF on campus, Caplan said he hoped people judged political parties by principles rather than by personalities.

No successor has been chosen to fill the vacant post. CCF executives are elected rather than appointed, he said, and there was no point in holding an election before the Model Parliament session.

Dembski said he made the move because he thought the "politically-minded student must not isolate himself in the world of 'political theory'".

Speakers Named

Weather permitting, the speaker of the Canadian House of Commons will do the same job for the U of T Model Parliament's opening session Tuesday evening. Parliament officials announced yesterday.

But, if cloudy weather means that Rt. Hon. Roland Michener will have to take the train to Ottawa rather than fly, he will have to cancel the appointment.

Names of speakers for the other sessions were also released yesterday. John Roberts of the U of T Economics Department will be speaker Wednesday afternoon and Prof. Bora Laskin will fill the post in the evening.

Students' Administrative Council chairman Jerry Case will be speaker Thursday afternoon and evening. Hart House Warden Joseph McCulley will read the speech from the throne Tuesday evening.

Prime Minister Jeremy Johnston (IV Trin) last night announced three of the bills which will be presented to the parliament.

They are:

—a proposal for Senate reform including a renewable 12-year term for senators, an age limit of 80 and a provision allowing provincial lieutenant-governors to appoint up to 33 of up to 112 senators,

—a Bill of Rights, and —legislation calling for: books of unions affecting more than one province to be audited annually by the Canada Labor Relations Board, union officials to be elected by a secret ballot at least once every three years and all union contributions to political parties to be by a per-capita voluntary levy.

Liberal club president Dick Hamilton last night called the Conservative bills "unrealistic and inadequate in solving the problems they concern."

"They do not cover matters of current urgency," he said.

The Conservative party last night announced four new cabinet appointments. They are: Justice Minister, Jim Bailey (I Law); Finance Minister, Bill McKeown (III Law) and Ministers-without-portfolio John LeClare (II Law) and Doug Pepliat (II Trinity).

The Liberal club also announced ed an appointment last night. Rick Alway (I SMC) was elected to fill the publicity vice-presidency which Clare Lewis (II Vic) was forced to vacate because of illness.

Nfcus Gives Support To Laval's Lacharite

OTTAWA—CUP—The National Federation of Canadian University Students yesterday threw its weight behind Normand Lacharite, Laval University student.

Nfcus president Mortimer Bistricky asked for the formation of a commission to investigate the circumstances surrounding Lacharite's dismissal from Laval last month.

Lacharite was expelled after he wrote an article in Le Carabin, the Laval student newspaper, attacking the university administration and supporting the struggle of three University of Ottawa student editors banned from participation in their paper, La Rotonde.

Bistricky suggested the investigating commission should be composed of students from universities other than Laval, and a Quebec member of the Canadian Association of University Teachers.

A national conference of the Canadian University Press also came out behind Lacharite last week with a motion condemning the Laval administration for suppressing the right of freedom of the press.

Lacharite was first denied re-admission to the University of Ottawa in September after he published an article in La Rotonde accusing the U of O administration of "paternalism". Publication of Lacharite's report on the controversy in La Rotonde cost this year's three editors their jobs. Louis Cliche, Pierre Trudel and Roger Roy were banned from participation in the paper by the U of O administration in October.

Lacharite requested and received a review of his case after he was informed of his dismissal by Laval authorities. But the administrative decision was not revoked.

Lacharite has applied for admission to the University of Montreal.

For SAC Vote Shift

Students' Administrative Council president Vince Kelly came out Tuesday night in favour of advanced student elections.

Kelly proposed the plan at a meeting of the St. Michael's College Students' Administrative Council.

"It is an idea which might well be considered by other faculties on campus," Kelly said last night. If all Students' Administrative Council representatives were elected early in February, the Council might achieve a greater degree of continuity in their personnel."

The new plan would allow newly-elected representatives to attend SAC meetings during the month and to choose their portfolios at the end of February.

"New SAC representatives would have a chance to acquaint themselves with Council machinery," he continued. "As most of us know, the Council is now operating on a quarter-million dollar corporation and it is becoming increasingly difficult for the representative representatives to grasp control efficiently and effectively."

Kelly plans to bring the plan up at the next university SAC meeting.

SMC SAC president Mike McCabe said the St. Mike's SAC was not opposed to the plan, as long as elections were held in the second week in February rather than the first.

Last week elections would interfere with the SMC bookshow "Mighties" and the "At Home,"

News Snaps

Another Photo Contest . . .

Male photographers on campus will have a second chance to enter their best efforts in a contest next month, but the privilege has been denied to women.

The Hart House Camera Club's 37th annual photo contest is open only to Hart House members.

Deadline for contest entries is Feb. 13. Entry blanks with contest information are available from the Hart House hall porter's desk.

Entries may be submitted in four categories: pictorial prints, Karsh trophy, color transparencies, photographic essay. Top winner in each division will be awarded a trophy prize.

Pictures will be judged Feb. 15 by a three-man panel of photographers.

Camera Club member Ron Carr last night said the contest ban on females shouldn't be severely criticized.

"Perhaps if enough girls showed an interest in photography an exhibition open to them as well could be arranged," Carr said.

Nfcus contest entries have been returned and are available at the Students' Administrative Council office, he said.

Tickets For Dief . . .

Students' Administrative Council officials last night said about half the 400 tickets available to students for a convocation Jan. 12 honoring Canada's prime minister have been taken.

The convocation, at which Prime Minister John Diefenbaker will receive an honorary doctorate of laws from U of T President Claude T. Bissell, will be the occasion of the prime minister's first public speech since his return from abroad, Progressive Conservative sources here said yesterday.

shaviour

Sooner or later the aura of romantic mysticism which surrounds the figure of Fidel Castro will have to be penetrated and the man himself examined from a clear and objective standpoint.

Sympathy, with the peculiar exception of the British Government, has been all on his side. Batista and his undoubtedly corrupt regime have been almost unanimously condemned. But while the world has condemned Batista for intellectual reasons, it has sympathized with Castro for purely emotional ones.

Castro symbolizes the cause of good, clean democracy. His long struggle, his unyielding faith, his loyalty to his cause and his eventual victory would make him a hero in any man's language. Some people have already linked his name with the great Italian liberator Garibaldi. A few daring observers have gone further and allowed the sacred name of Washington to cross their lips.

Flushed and exhausted by his victory Castro is presently following a policy of "revolutionary justice". All persons whose participation in the last government could be deemed treasonable will be brought to trial.

Besides setting up a 24-member revolutionary council and promising to legalize gambling and prostitution, the new rulers have done nothing else but threaten reprisals against the British government because of sales of Sea Fury aircraft and Mercury tanks to Batista.

Castro is a former student of Columbia University. His revolution is obviously based on sincere intellectual beliefs and a hatred and disgust of government tyranny in Cuba. Cuban university students have supported his cause almost since he first landed. Three of the last four presidents of the Cuban students' federation were executed by Batista, presumably because of pro-Castro sympathies.

Cuba's new government will certainly be different from her last one. From all that we can gather it will probably be a better one. But time, tide and the affairs of men alone can justify civil war, and the romantics who see a Washington behind the Cuban hero's beard may well find that a shave will reveal a Cromwell.

Some Political Notes

Last night a brilliant young idealist, one of the three top men in the campus CCF party, resolved a conflict which has been bothering him since last September. Peter Dembski's defection to the Liberal party is significant. Dembski entered socialism by way of Adlai Stevenson, thought he saw similar ideals in the Canadian socialist party, joined, and quickly rose through the ranks.

Basic incompatibilities the St. Mike's student encountered centered round the socialist conception of the individual's will. He sees in a socialist system acceptance of the belief that man's will can be formed for good by the government of that society. Dembski believes this contradicts the idea that all good or virtue must ultimately proceed from the individual's will.

Though he will sit for the Libs in the Model Parliament, Dembski is by no means convinced of all that the Liberals uphold.

Rather he sees in the Liberal party an outlet for the expression of his ideas and ideals. CCF president Jerry Caplan publicly praises Dembski's sincerity, privately thinks there is much in Dembski's reasoning which is theoretical. Caplan says his former vice-president entered the CCF impetuously, but thinks there is a possibility he might come back.

Although Caplan doesn't believe the deflection will hurt his party on campus, there remains cal meat for the other two parties . . .

Other Gleanings . . .

Happiest man after campus election results last month was Liberal President Dick Hamilton. Hamilton sees in the election figures a clear gain for the Grits, says both PCs and CCF were down 450 votes on last year while the Libs only lost 50.

Three main bills are tucked under the Tory wings for parliament's opening Tuesday . . . with possibility of a fourth hidden behind their tail. First bill, obviously, is a new Bill of Rights. Betting is that this amendment to the British North America Act will meet less opposition than its partner, a bill to reform the Senate.

Third government bill deals with labor relations, calls for reform of some union administration techniques. Campus CCF'ers say this isn't very controversial, concede they might go along with it.

Fourth bill isn't drafted yet, may be just a resolution of general confidence in the Diefenbaker government's foreign policy.

All in all government bills follow earlier predictions that they would merely echo federal feelings, spin out dull three days for student politicians.

Bursaries

Dear Sir:

From my own sad experience, and from what I have been told by other students, the Dominion-Provincial Bursaries have generally been reduced very considerably, in several cases to less than one-half the amounts given last year or of the modest amounts applied for. This has probably had something to do with the business depression which made it very hard to get summer jobs, and resulted in a greater number of applicants. However, the Dominion and Ontario governments should provide additional funds for bursaries if they are really as interested in education as they profess to be.

Maybe we should pray that the Russians will soon send Super-Sputniks to Moon, Mars, Venus, Saturn, etc., to shatter the complacency of our governments more than Sputnik I did. (I am afraid, though, they won't. As one of my fellow-students put it: The Russians will just smile understandingly and know that their day will come a helluva lot sooner.)

LORRY STACEY

BILL KENNEDY
Signs Whitby Contract

MIKE ELIK
Also to OHA Maroons

Three Members of Hockey Blues Agree to Join OHA Senior Cubs

Three members of the Intercollegiate champion, University of Toronto Blues will join teams in the Ontario Hockey Association Senior A series when the college league finishes in March.

Centre and team captain Mike Elik, along with defenseman Lorry Stacey, are slated to join Chatham Maroons, currently in sole possession of second place in the NOHA-OHA division.

And winger Bill Kennedy has signed a contract to play with the reigning world champion Whitby Dunlops, who hold a seven-point margin over Belleville McFarlands in the OHA Eastern Division.

Elik and Stacey are in their final year of Engineering, while Kennedy is in second year Arts at Victoria College.

Blues' captain, now 23, joined the team in 1956 after a year with Baby Blues and a sparkling junior career with Toronto Marlboros and St. Michael's College Majors.

Stacey came to Varsity after play with Hap Emms' Barrie Flyers in the OHA Junior A Circuit. He, too, performed for one season with the Intermediates before moving up to Jack Kennedy's crew. He is now 23.

Kennedy, who captained Turk Broda's Marlboros and played on a Memorial Cup champion team, is in his first season with Varsity. He turned down a professional bid from New York Rangers to enroll here.

A clever stickhandler and hard skater, the 22-year-old forward started the season at centre, but moved to wing with Dave Stephen and Dunc Brodie, thereby forming a second potent unit to go with Blues' first line of Elik, Grant Mills and John Macdonald.

Reports from Chatham and Whitby have indicated the trio will commence play when the college season ends in February, but Blues play their final games on the first weekend in March.

Varsity finishes the season away against Laval, and it is probable the three players will remain with the team until after the final game against Rouge et Or.

Ice Chips: Blues travel by car to Kingston this Saturday for exhibition play with Kingston Merchants of the senior loop... not CKLC's, as yesterday's Varsity erroneously reported... possible second game with Whitby has been tentatively slated for February 16 in Varsity Arena... Coach Kennedy meets with Dunlop GM Wren Blair tomorrow to iron out details.

First Intercollegiate game of the New Year looms on the horizon a week from tomorrow night when McGill Redmen move into view for an 8 p.m. affair... Redmen are winless in three starts, and Varsity will be out to boost their scoring records.

Shorter Holidays?

Bissell Defends His Plan 'Education Must Be First'

U of T President Claude T. Bissell defended his idea of shortening the holiday periods at U of T in an address to the Toronto branch of the Canadian Women's Press Club Tuesday.

"I believe we should give first place to education. It is a full-time job and, after all, it is not asking too much that students should devote three or four years of their lives to it," he said.

Dr. Bissell said universities are "less expensive than DEW lines and more effective as a means of maintaining world peace."

Regarding the attitude of the press and other mass media towards higher education, Dr. Bissell said the old attitude of "almost unconscious malice" resulting in emphasis on student escapades, academic scandals and football games had been recently replaced by more favorable publicity.

"The time has come when we must relate the problems and changes in higher education to mass media," he said. "A university president must be something of a public relations officer and all universities must tell their story in a more flamboyant way."

Of the Crowe dispute, Dr. Bissell said it was certainly news, and

"the press across Canada covered it as such."

He said the figure of the professor is no longer one of an "amiable idiot" but that he is emerging as an important force in society.

A University of Toronto professor has suggested the establishment of an Arctic station for scientific study by Canadian university students and faculty.

Dr. J. Tuzo Wilson, Professor of Geophysics, believes this would improve the status of Canadians as "people of the north" and also "improve our position in the vanguard of exploration and knowledge of the Arctic regions."

"I suspect the Russians already know more than we do about the Arctic," he said.

The proposed site is beside Lake Hazen, 600 miles from the pole, and sheltered by an Ellesmere Island range.

Universities have a strong tendency to teach conventional studies and neglect the new. With more exciting discoveries, space science and other subjects will be taught, according to Dr. Wilson.

He also suggested the Arctic station could be used as a summer ski resort.

Second Gift For Archives 1905 Year Pennant, Pin

The University College archives have made their second acquisition in three weeks.

UC Principal F. C. A. Jeanneret accepted the pennant of the class of 1905, and a class pin of the same year in a ceremony yesterday afternoon.

The articles, contained in a frame with a short history, were presented by the local continuing Class Committee of that year.

Mrs. Roy Greenway, the valedictorian of the class, said the class had taken up a collection of $13.50 and the committee had managed to raise another 25 cents to make up the total amount necessary for the purchase of the pennant in 1902.

The class pin included in the frame was donated by Miss Laura Newman, original purchaser of the pennant.

In accepting the gift, Dr. Jeanneret said, "It was quite a remarkable class and this is quite a remarkable pennant."

Debates Begin For UC Men

The traditional lunch-hour entertainment of University College, the Robinette Debates, will resume later this month.

Debating is for men only, and officials hope for a good turnout of both experienced and novice debaters. All are welcome to sign the list to be posted on the main bulletin board of UC.

Prospective debaters should sign by Thursday, Jan. 22. Teams will consist of two each. Partners will be named for those not signing up in teams.

The debates will take place at 1 p.m. and 4 p.m. on school-days only. A schedule of exact dates and topics will be posted shortly.

Winners will receive a prize, and will challenge the winners of Portia, the women's debating league, at the last Red and White Night.

Varsity Man Reports From Cuba

JUBILANT rebel Fidel Castro, now strong-man of Cuba, is interviewed by Doug Marshall, Varsity editor-in-chief, who made his way into Cuba two days ago to size up the situation from the point of view of a student journalist. In background are Castro supporters. (Picture by CUPHoto—Drummond)

Castro Applauds Canuck Students

By DOUG MARSHALL
Varsity Editor-in-Chief

WITH FIDEL CASTRO'S ARMY — Fidel Castro, flushed with victory and trembling with fatigue, sometimes weeping, sometimes cheering, broke from his surging circle of admirers, clasped my hand last night and said:

"My congratulations to Canadian university students. There is true sympathy between the youth of our two countries.

"Cuban students are grateful that you did not fight for Batista. They are grateful for the vote of support from your national students' federation.

"We salute you."

He spoke in battered English as we two, arm in arm, struggled to stay upright in the hysterical torrent of admirers and well-wishers.

We gave it up and were borne with the crowd to the white-walled, red-tiled town hall of Matanzas, Cuba's fourth largest city and 60 miles from Havana.

In the turmoil Castro turned to me and said:

"I still love the British people.

"They betrayed us, but they did not know the true facts.

"People who have withstood the terror of German bombings followed by socialist disruption could not possibly be against us and for Batista."

Castro, standing six foot two inches, towered over the seething followers. He had a lofty, almost serene calmness in his hard brown eyes.

As we stood and talked, three or four picked 26th of July soldiers circled round us, warding off the more fanatical Cubans. Castro, a four-year myth, symbol of a tired nation, was treated like a juke-box idol after a public appearance.

"People," he told me, "want to tear me to bits. They grab pieces of my clothing, hair, beard . . . everything. It's wonderful, but I don't understand it — especially the beard. It's not only myself" — he gave a broad sweep of his hand — "it's everyone here, all of us together, that did it."

I asked him about the execution of former Batista sympathisers and informers. He winked at me and said: "They take risks, they know they take risks . . ."

He broke off and shrugged.

I asked Castro, before he went into the hall, if it would be possible for me to get shot at, like the rest of the boys.

The tall, suave Cuban merely smiled and casually put a bullet through my foot . . .

Third Great Trek?

Fee Hike Worries UBC

VANCOUVER — CUP — Students of the University of British Columbia are ready to start the third great trek in the face of a possible $200 fee increase.

A student opinion poll by the undergrad neyepaper The Ubysey revealed that a march on Victoria and the provincial government will be necessary in order to present the increase unless the government meets the requested budget.

The government's decision on the budget request will be announced when Premier Bennett brings down the budget in the legislature later this month.

Geoffrey O. B. Davies, administrative assistant to the president said Monday that if the university request is denied, the board of governors will meet in February to decide what action to take.

He declared that a fee increase would be a "last resort". A Jan. 6 deadline in The Ubysey announced "the third trek" and a front page editorial demanded students write their Provincial Parliament representatives protesting the fee hike and if this is not effective to follow with a physical trek.

Student president Chuck Conaghan said the use of the term "third-trek" was "a bit premature".

"We will wait for the result of our attack by letter before considering going to the people for aid in combating the impending fees increase", he said.

"If the campaign fails to win government support through personal letters to MLA's, we will have to investigate other methods.

"This may include a third Great trek," he added, and sending a letter to every BC student on campus. It is Conaghan's hope that these letters will result in a barrage of personal protests against the fee increase.

The University of British Columbia has seen two great treks in its 50-years history.

The first in 1927 and the second in 1957 resulted in the completion of building and increased funds from the government.

Winter Carnival Same As 58's

Format for U of T's Winter Carnival Jan. 30-31 will be almost identical to last year's, Blue and White chairman Dave Pinkham said last night.

The Carnival committee originally hopes to introduce radical changes into the Carnival schedule. But the committee has found it impossible to co-ordinate other arrangements, Pinkham said.

Only major change in this year's program will be the elimination of events on Thursday, he said.

Plans so far include a hockey game between The Varsity and the Students' Administrative Council Friday afternoon Jan. 30, Carnival queen competitions all day Friday, and crowning of the Carnival queen at Friday night's Laval-U of T hockey game in Varsity Arena.

The committee is attempting to arrange a skating show in the Arena Friday night, Pinkham said.

Events on Saturday, Jan. 31 will all be held at Caledon Farms. Plans include games, meals, sports and a Carnival ball.

The committee will also arrange for constructing an ice igloo on the Front Campus, and will accept applications from students who want to sleep in it for a night.

Pinkham originally hoped to keep all Carnival events on campus this year. Cause of the proposed change was the financial instability of events at Caledon. Operating cost for food and equipment remain static, although bad weather can cause a decreased attendance and thus a financial loss, Pinkham said.

Possibilities of sporting events in Varsity Arena Saturday afternoon and a dance in Hart House Saturday night are still being investigated, Pinkham said.

70 To Debate Here

U of T campus will shortly be invaded by about 70 Canadian and American debaters.

Invitations have been sent to 30 universities for U of T's annual debating tournament February 5-8.

U of T Debating Union President Robin Beamish said last night the tournament's debate topic is, tentatively, Canadian neutralism. Debates are planned for Thursday afternoon and all day Friday and Saturday in Hart House. Women will be allowed to attend.

UTDU officials expect representatives from six Canadian and 12 American universities. Each team will consist of four members.

The tournament is expected to be sponsored by Carling Breweries, Ltd. The Bassett Trophy donated by the Telegram will be presented to the winning team at Saturday night's banquet.

Beamish said the tournament winners will debate the same topic against U of T later on national television.

Parliament Nearing . . .

A debate on foreign affairs will occupy the third night of the Model Parliament. Prime Minister Jeremy Johnston (IV Trin) said last night.

Instead of introducing a fourth bill, the government has decided to hold a general foreign policy debate along the lines of the speech from the throne, he said. "This will allow a greater latitude for those participating in the debate," Johnston said.

"The government is certainly not committed to slavishly follow the foreign policy of either the United States or Canada."

"We naturally have our own ideas on foreign policy and we intend to try to incorporate them as much as possible," he said.

The Conservative party last night announced six new cabinet appointments. They are: Trade and Commerce Minister, Julian Porter (IV Vic); Health and

February Blood Drip Needs Two Locations

Student blood will be spilt in the School of Nursing in mid-February when the U of T's blood-donor campaign opens.

"Toronto requires 1,500 pints of blood every week," Charlotte Hubbell, Blood Campaign chairman said yesterday. "We hope university students will come forth to supply the demand."

The campus campaign will last from Feb. 16-20. The campaign committee is looking for another location in addition to the Nursing School where anticipated crowds can be handled Feb. 19 and 20.

As in previous years, the Blood Campaign Cannon will be awarded to the faculty with the most blood donors U of T will also compete with universities across Canada for the Corpusele Cup.

Blood collected by the Red Cross is given free to those who need. The Red Cross has a blood campaign going on somewhere all the time, officials said last night, so that a continuous supply of whole blood is assured.

SAC Considers New Constitution

Extraordinary meeting of the Students' Administrative Council comes up Wednesday to consider a new constitution.

The constitution, drafted last term by the constitution committee, is a complete revision of the old one — drawn up in the early thirties.

Copies of the planned constitution have been circulated to all SAC members.

Sharpen Up Salk Needles To Give Swift, Short Jabs

Both divisions of the University Health Service will swing into action with another round of Salk polio vaccine shots next week.

Men students who wish to begin the three-shot immunization procedure have been asked to report to the Health Service at 110 St. George St. between 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. Thursday.

The women's division of the Health Service will be offering the inoculations from 12 to 2 p.m. Tuesday and from 2 to 4 p.m. Wednesday.

Time between the first and second shots of the series should be no less than a month, Health Department officials said last night, while time limit between the second and third shots is from seven months to a year.

Students receiving their first shot next week will be offered a second injection in February and a third in November, the officials said.

First two shots of the series, officials said, are the immunizing shots — the third is a "booster."

The Varsity - a weekend review

Creeping Indifference In SMC

By TERRY BOURKE
Varsity Staff Reporter

The career of student indifference at St. Michael's College has already killed one student organization, and is slowly eating away at the life of another.

The official college literary magazine, The Gryphon, died this week because lack of contributions made the whole project a useless venture.

Editor Joan Bulger said last night "from the way things are shaping up at present, it is pretty definite the publication will go on the rocks this year".

She blamed failure of The Gryphon on the fact that students "do not have enough time to devote to composing the type of serious literature demanded by the magazine."

Gerry Rossi, treasurer of the SMC Students' Administrative Council, said SAC would not refuse funds for a spring issue if "those in charge change their plans and decide to go ahead".

Rossi said it was the feeling of SAC that The Gryphon was not "reaching" all the students in the college. If the group does not "inject more popular appeal into its system and alter the general layout of the magazine, SAC might not back future editions," he said.

He singled out the absence of publicity as a major factor in grinding The Gryphon into the ground.

Another organization threatened with extinction in the near future is the SMC Music Guild. Poor showings at music concerts held twice a month in Brennan Hall are shoving the Guild into oblivion.

The Guild goes on trial for its life this Sunday. The turnout at an all-star jazz concert scheduled for 8.30 p.m. in Brennan Hall will decide the fate of the club.

If only a handful of students attend, the Guild's activities may grind to a halt for the year. The club's executive plans to present SMC SAC with a petition for permission to completely overhaul the structure of the organizations.

Three years ago SMC SAC took over control of all student finances at the college. Student clubs kept their independence, but SAC reserved the right to collect dues in SAC fees and apportion funds out to the organizations.

Blasting the existing relationship between the college SAC and the Guild, SAC president Mike McCabe said "as far as I am concerned, the SAC should never have taken over.

If there is no audience, the money might be better spent elsewhere".

MCCabe said "apathy has set in among SMC students, and they don't realize it's costing them $2 to belong to the Guild".

The grim reality of the Music Guild problem was shown last November. A soprano hired by the Guild to sing at Brennan Hall concert was attended by an Audience of six.

Vince Kelly, SMC SAC vice-president, said "students failed to appreciate the kind of musical entertainment provided for them, the classical and semi-classical music."

He said the Guild executive have made their position clear. "Since the campus is determined to return to the old coffee and donuts sing song talent festival every second Sunday, they have indicated they will resign if the SMC student attitude remains unfavorable to the present program of music."

Mentioning the Gryphon, he said the writers' group was producing "esoteric bunk". This "isolated group is producing intellectual rubble that is not even comprehensible," he said.

"The only magazine that will become a success at SMC is the one students ask for and support on their own terms," he added.

Vice-president Sue Morin said the ties of the Music Guild have destroyed the "aristocratic clique effect of the club. Now that the guild is open to all SMC students the selectiveness and the prestige which the club once had have vanished."

Miss Morin said chances are the Guild will not fold this year. "But unless the program is altered to the extent it appeals to the majority demands it will definitely go under."

SAC members feel confident students at SMC will give the guild a vote of confidence this Sunday and thus a new lease on life.

the World this Week

Two flares glared last week, one about 4,000 miles from the moon, the other on a bright, fun-loving Caribbean island called Cuba. Both flares spelled doom to complacency and self-satisfaction.

The difference, however, between the Russian rocket now orbiting the sun and Fidel Castro's revolution is that the West will soon forget about what the rocket implies while Cuba is never likely to forget what Castro implies.

For the fourth time in a little more than a year the Western democracies have felt butterflies in their stomachs, told each other about it, taken aspirin and destroyed the pain but not the real cause of their illness. All indications are they will do so again.

Cuba, alternatively, has presented herself with a "fait accompli." The cause of her illness has been wiped out completely — has been scattered across lands less inclined to play along with its filth.

Welfare Minister, Hart Rossman (I UC); Mines and Technical Surveys Minister, Pat Wootton, (I Trin); Defence Production, Bill Graham (II Trin); and Minister of Fisheries, Ed Roberts (II Vic). Prime Minister Johnston also announced the appointment of Joyce Walker (II Trin) as Secretary of State in the Model Parliament Cabinet.

Liberal Parliamentary leader Phil Goulston (II UC) last night said the Conservatives' labour bill "isn't as comprehensive as it is made out to be, because the majority of the trade labour unions in Canada are subject to the observation of the provincial boards, and not to the federal government."

CCF leader Hugh Peacock (II UC) said "on the whole it's a safe bill except for the little word and the little idea they try to sneak in every once in a while."

Meanwhile, Johnston blasted Liberal Club president Dick Hamilton for terming the government's bills unrealistic and inadequate.

"If they think the bills are inadequate then we'll see what constructive amendments they bring up," he said.

The three-day, five-sitting session of the Model Parliament gets underway next Tuesday in the chambers of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

Students Shun It

Inside the entrance of the Gallery is a display of contemporary sculpture. Two lean figures in brass sit upon a brass bench. The piece is called "King and Queen," and is by one of Britain's foremost sculptors, Henry Moore.

Canadian artists are represented in a separate collection, as well as in one of the present special exhibits, "100 Years of Painting in Ontario." This ranges from old water colors of Indians and wigwags to the more modern interpretations of the Group of Seven. "West Wind" by Tom Thompson of this group of painters is one of the better known works. Lectures on this exhibit are featured this month during the free Open Night Programs at the Gallery every Wednesday.

Painting can be profitable. French painter Bernard Buffet owns two Rolls Royces. His portrait of Charles De Gaulle appeared on the cover of last week's Time magazine.

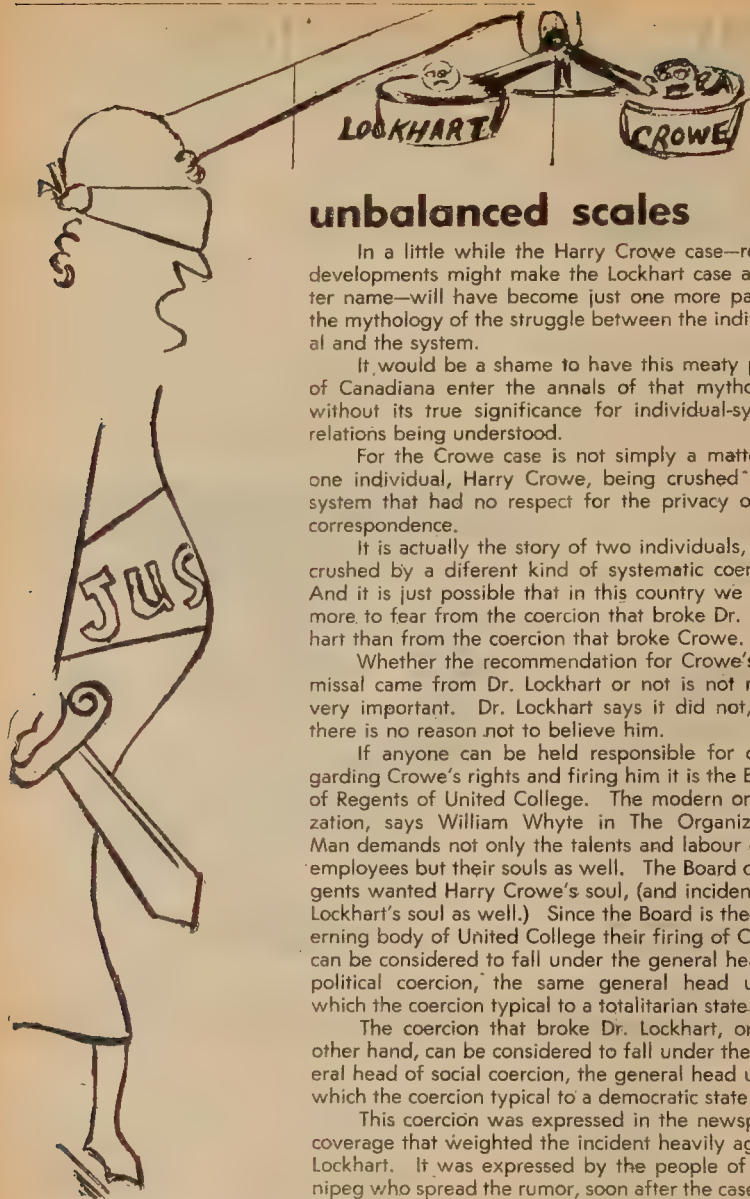

Buffet is included in an exhibition of young French and German painters and sculptors titled "Biennale '57" which opens at the Gallery January 10. This exhibit is said to reflect the turbulence of post war Europe. The French canvasses are masses of vivid color. The figures are stark and linear, and the paint so heavy it seems about to slide down the wall.

The German works are in complete contrast to the above paintings. They are mainly small canvasses in subdued colors. Perhaps they show a tendency to conservatism after the excesses of the last World War.

A reclining mermaid of welded brass is one of the pieces of sculpture in this exhibit, which incorporates the old techniques in stone and metal, with the newer media of welded rods and sheet metal.

"Biennale '57" was first hung in Paris' Louvre. It gained popular approval.

It would be a shame if it did not at least gain attention here.

unbalanced scales

In a little while the Harry Crowe case—recent developments might make the Lockhart case a better name—will have become just one more part of the mythology of the struggle between the individual and the system.

It would be a shame to have this meaty piece of Canadiana enter the annals of that mythology without its true significance for individual-system relations being understood.

For the Crowe case is not simply a matter of one individual, Harry Crowe, being crushed by a system that had no respect for the privacy of his correspondence.

It is actually the story of two individuals, each crushed by a different kind of systematic coercion. And it is just possible that in this country we have more to fear from the coercion that broke Dr. Lockhart than from the coercion that broke Crowe.

Whether the recommendation for Crowe's dismissal came from Dr. Lockhart or not is not really very important. Dr. Lockhart says it did not, and there is no reason not to believe him.

If anyone can be held responsible for disregarding Crowe's rights and firing him it is the Board of Regents of United College. The modern organization, says William Whyte in The Organization Man demands not only the talents and labour of its employees but their souls as well. The Board of Regents wanted Harry Crowe's soul, (and incidentally, Lockhart's soul as well.) Since the Board is the governing body of United College their firing of Crowe can be considered to fall under the general head of political coercion, the same general head under which the coercion typical to a totalitarian state falls.

The coercion that broke Dr. Lockhart, on the other hand, can be considered to fall under the general head of social coercion, the general head under which the coercion typical to a democratic state falls.

This coercion was expressed in the newspaper coverage that weighted the incident heavily against Lockhart. It was expressed by the people of Winnipeg who spread the rumor, soon after the case was made public, that Lockhart was steaming open his faculty members' mail. It is the social coercion that has to find an individual scapegoat and found one in Lockhart just as the Board of Regents had found one in Crowe.

It is in short the coercion that arises from the combination of public power and public irresponsibility.

The Crowe case, then, has provided an example of at least two types of coercion of the individual that can operate in an organized society; (a) coercion exercised by a governing body, and (b) coercion exercised by the people as instruments of social pressure.

Although the former kind of coercion is getting to be more of a problem with the advance of bureaucratization than it used to be, a democracy has, in general less to fear from it than from the latter kind.

It is less of a danger because the tradition of public resistance to political coercion still exists. In fact the second danger, that of social coercion, arises out of the wanton use of precisely this tradition by an irresponsible public. And it is because it is built into the structure of our political principles that it is a greater danger.

When the public uses its power to break a man like Lockhart it is playing false to the principle of individualism that democracy was formed to protect and playing into the hands of the kind of coercion it was formed to resist.

When sovereignty is vested in a central authority, the danger to freedom is that this authority may become a centre of exploitation and coercion. But when, as in this country, the sovereignty is vested in the people, they themselves are in danger of becoming their own greatest enemies. S.A.

CUP president reports:

The Three Faces Of Canada

(CUP) — this logotype has appeared periodically in this and other university papers across the country for the past 21 years. But with a little bit of luck it will appear much more in the future because of a conference two weeks ago that lifted a typical Canadian organization out of typical Canadian mediocrity.

To visitors to the annual conference of the Canadian University Press annual conference in Winnipeg at the end of December, it was probably difficult to appreciate just what was going on.

For 21 years CUP has limped along half-heartedly in a disorganized fashion. Wires, telephone calls, and clippings from other papers have allowed editors to get some news from other campuses. But the desire for this has failed toward the end of the year because of the lack of any central strong executive to make the organization cooperate.

As Canadians we are distinguished by three definite characteristics which pervade our feelings and dealings with each other and with strangers. All three of these aspects of our national character were in great evidence in Winnipeg but only the gods can decide whether it was a typically Canadian decision that the 23 papers reached.

From the times when our forefathers had to hack their way through the trees to find the forest, we have been unaccountably timid and restrained. Where a half-way measure would do temporarily, we let it stand, cautiously allowing others to go whole hog later. We have basked in the realization that to be provincial is to be safe.

And caution there was when the CUP delegates were asked to approve a paid president from among themselves. It was hoped that a trial would prove that CUP could be more than just a casual news-service and a hair-raising, throat-parching conference at Christmas.

But the scheme for at last stabilizing CUP would have gone down in unbridled flames had it not been for a fiery speech and consequent emoting by the majority of the conference.

And it is here that our second and most notable national characteristic comes into play — an emotional "Canadianism" which must shock visitors to our country.

Our eyes become as a spaniel's when scorned by its master if someone criticises "our weather." We become watery with joy if "one of our boys" becomes the world's Pareschi champion. We belch fire through our noses if someone says we wear the same kind of pyjamas as the Americans.

So it was with the idea of a Canadian organization to serve Canadian students, to tell them what Canada is about, that finally hit the right chords in Winnipeg.

Until then the conference had proceeded uneasily and at times unhappily. And the fault lay in the lack of knowledge of what "the other fellow" was thinking and what his problems were.

It is this last aspect which has cannon-balled many similar organizations and projects which depended on some sort of collective thinking and sympathy.

The job of educating Canadians about Canada remains a formidable task. It was probably with this in mind that the National Federation of Canadian University Students offered its facilities to CUP.

Part of Nicus' job has been or should have been drawing university students in this country together—but except for a few student politicians who go to conferences, it has failed in this respect.

CUP should be able to accomplish part of this job of public education on the university level. News from varied campuses will be one thing, but interpretative articles of student opinion and problems will be another and more important job.

If CUP president Doug Parkinson can convince next year's conference that the paid-president experiment will be a good thing, it will have been only because the editors learned something of Canadian student problems through his efforts.

Readers of this paper will see new datelines this year and next, and they will be able to read of some of the problems being faced on campuses other than their own.

News and features will appear which would never normally make any metropolitan papers. They will appear because as students we have a common interest in what happens on other campuses.

"Okay, so now you know the truth."

Lois Marshall, brilliant young Canadian soprano, returns from concert tours in England and Russia to appear in PETER GRIMES.

World TV Premiere

CBC Folio are embarking upon a daring but worth while venture on Tuesday when they will be presenting the world TV premiere of Benjamin Britten's Opera, "Peter Grimes", on CBC Folio. This modern opera is a challenge to any company with its intricate musical score and unusual harmonies, and it will be very interesting to see how CBC makes out with such an ambitious undertaking.

Certainly vocally there should be few disappointments, as a strong cast has been selected, headed by Lois Marshall and Richard Cassilly. Lois Marshall needs no introduction to a Canadian audience, and her fine soprano voice will be heard in the role of Ellen Orford, the village school-mistress. Richard Cassilly is the only import in the cast, and he has come up from New York to take the harsh tragic role of Peter Grimes.

The role of Grimes was originally created by the composer specifically for the famous English tenor, Peter Pears, who sang in the first production of the opera with the Sadlers Wells Company in 1947. Since then the opera has received wide acclaim throughout the world, and has been performed by nearly every major opera company. However it has never before been staged in Canada and Tuesday's performance will therefore mark a very significant stage in Canada's opera productions. The opera was broadcast three times on CBC, and each time received very enthusiastic response.

"Peter Grimes" is the tragic story of a proud and lonely fisherman, who is shunned by all the other inhabitants of a little English fishing village, save for the schoolmistress, Ellen Orford. When both Grimes' apprentices drown one after the other, suspicion immediately falls on Grimes, and even Ellen his one and only friend and support, loses faith in him, and Grimes slowly becomes demented, and sails out to sea, never to return again.

Supporting Lois Marshall and Richard Cassilly will be a large number of talented Canadian singers: Irene Byatt, Patricia Rideout, Luba Hanushak, Patricia Snell, Alan Crofoot, Harry Mossfield, Ernest Adams, Andrew MacMillan and James Whichee. Most of these singers will be known to the Toronto audiences for the active part they took in this year's Opera Festival; and the Festival singers will supply the supporting Chorus; under the direction of Elmer Iseler. Staging the Opera is a well-known figure in the operatic circles — Herman Geiger-Torel, and Dr. Ettore Mazzoleni, also of the Royal Conservatory, will be the conductor.

HHOA - UTFS

The Hart House Orchestra, under the direction of Boyd Neel, will present the third concert in its 1959-60 series, on Saturday in the Hart House Great Hall at 9:00 p.m.

The program for this concert will include works by Locatelli, Tchaikovsky, Lekeu and Manfredini.

Those interested in this concert can obtain tickets (Students $1.00, non-students $2.00) before the concert at the Hall Porter's desk, Hart House.

There are also a limited number of half-season memberships available to the U of T Film Society at $2.50. Up-and-coming films include: VIVA ZAPATA! DAY OF WRATH, BATTLESHIP POTEMKIN and BORIS GODUNOV. These memberships may also be obtained at the Hall Porter's lodge.

I VITELLONI

I VITELLONI, (with English sub-titles), a brilliant and compassionate study of Italy's so-called "heat generation", is now completing its run at the Pylon Theatre at College and Manning; it should not be missed by any serious film lover.

Scripted and directed by Federico Fellini, whose LA STRADA has received great acclaim here and abroad, and starring Franco Interlenghi, Leonora Ruffo, Alberto Sordi and Riccardo Fellini, the film deals with a group of "vitelloni" (literally, "big calves"); young men in their twenties and thirties who are not poor enough to have to work for a living, nor rich enough to avoid leading a parasitic life on family and friends; told in a bittersweet manner, the film is one of the finest to come out of Italy since the neo-realist school proper began to take a nosedive.

The film will be playing tonight and tomorrow. Members of the U of T Film Society are particularly urged to see it at once, as plans are afoot to substitute Fellini's latest film, LE NOTTI DI CABERIA in its place.

HILLEL REFLECTIONS

Literary magazines on this campus are a dime a dozen. Enough publications are sponsored by U of T students to stock a library yet each of these is an attempt to meet a certain need. In doing so, each magazine acquires its own distinctive literary personality—and Reflections '58 is no exception.

Reflections is the annual student publication of the Hillel Foundation. It is distributed free of charge to all its members, most of whom are the Jewish students on the campus. Editing the issue, which appeared earlier this week is Miriam Lerenbaum IV UC, assisted by Sam Ajzenstat (III UC).

Reflections is a unique magazine. It is distinctive in regard to its theme: the sounding of the Jewish mentality. This is obvious from the reproduction on the cover of a Jewish mural to its final article by Miriam Lerenbaum which analyzes even the position of Reflections in the life of the average Jewish student.

Of the six articles in Reflections, the first two are the most informative. They comprise lectures by Rabbi Aaron Komerling, Director of Hillel, and Rabbi Lou Silberman, its visiting speaker. Both men give highly involved discussions of ethical and historical problems in the Jewish faith.

The third contribution is the only piece of creative writing in the magazine. David Lewis Stein's "The Salesman" is a loosely-constructed story, on account of a Jewish merchant in a predominantly gentile community. Again the atmosphere is one of exploration, with attention given to a careful assessment and a compelling conclusion.

"The Organization Jew", the poorest of the articles, is a pastiche composed of a recorded panel discussion which took place at Hillel a year ago. It contains germinal ideas but lacks unity, perhaps the chief quality of all literature.

Sam Ajzenstat's "The Three Heads of Baal" is written in a droll but extremely proficient manner. Ajzenstat's subject is Christianity, Judaism and Humanism from an unusual viewpoint which is inclusive to the point of incomprehensibility. Ranging widely, illuminating each problem for an instant, he pursues his thesis, which culminates in an inner, not a geographical or material, quest.

At this point the reader is floundering in a veritable display of wit and wisdom, but he is rescued and returned to more immediate problems by Miriam Lerenbaum's concluding article. In "Epilogue" she tries to see Reflections as it fulfills its function: to sound the Jewish mind.

Regarded as a whole, Reflections '58 is an important campus magazine of high literary quality. While its subject matter may be extremely restricted, so is its audience. And this is unfortunate, particularly when Reflections could be more widely distributed and appreciated by students who now know nothing of its existence.

John Robert Colombo

Musical Potpourri

A musical potpourri of Mozart, Schubert and Russian contemporaries was the bill of fare at Wednesday's TSO subscription concert at Massey Hall. The audience went away with a bad taste in its mouth.

The Kabalevsky second symphony supposedly constituted the meat of the program. Its only claim to fame as a work, however, lay in its at the same time provoking and absurd overtones of Cecil B. DeMille. The work is, in a word, extravagant. Though conductor Walter Susskind gave a sympathetic and at times vibrant reading, the cheap theatrics of the first, the interminable second and the third movement's scenic train ride under Niagara were too much for him. The potentiality of theatrical material and colorful orchestration is totally marred by Kobalevsky's ridiculous tone-painting. A regrettable programming occurrence.

More successful and less appreciated was the Stravinsky Ode. An "elegiacal chant in three parts" dedicated to Natalie Koussevitzky in appreciation of her spiritual contribution to her husband's art, the work contains exciting fugue writing in the opening "Eulogy", delightful impressionistic afterthoughts in the "Eclogue", and accessible lyricism in the closing "Epitaph", enhanced throughout by the orchestra's transparency of sound.

Guest artists were permanent conductor-pianist Walter Susskind playing Mozart D minor concerto, K. 466 and guest conductor, Mario Bernardi who capably accompanied in the Mozart and opened the program with Wolf-Ferrari's overture to "The Secret of Suzanne". K. 466, the seventh of 12 piano concertos written in the prolific 1784-86 period, is the first in a minor mode, displaying passion and drama in three contrasting movements.

Closing the first half, the Schubert Unfinished Symphony was the biggest disappointment of the evening. The two beloved movements were indifferently rendered and woodwinds in the andante were ragged, good work in the trombone section offset by bassoon intonation troubles and a premature oboe entrance. UTDC...

The University of Toronto Drama Committee will present its annual festival of one-act plays in Hart House on Monday, January 12 and Tuesday, January 13 at 8:30 p.m. The adjudicator for both nights will be stage, radio and television actress Araby Lockhart.

The entries for this year's festival will include Tennessee Williams' AUTO-DA-FE, Ionesco's THE LESSON, Chekhov's ON THE HIGH ROAD, Bergson's THE BIRTHDAY PARTY and Samuel Beckett's END-GAME.

Tickets at 75 cents each are available for both nights at the Hart House Theatre Box Office, or through your various college representatives. It is advisable to get your tickets as soon as possible for what is without doubt the most exciting lineup of plays and productions to be seen at Hart House in many a long year. Those who are capable of distinguishing between a theatre and a bawdy house will be filled with a sombre, profound and paradoxical joy.

Distilled Sterility

THE TUNNEL OF LOVE (Loews Uptown) attempts to prove that marital sterility can be humorous. Needless to say, it fails.

Distilled from the Broadway show of 1957, which in turn was distilled from the best-selling comic novel by Peter De Vries, this decidedly off-colour film is dedicated to the somewhat pornographic proposition that "one and one usually makes three". In mixing a smutty amalgam of sex and surrealistic suburbia, screenwriter Joseph Fields emits a steady drool of risqué remarks guaranteed to arouse even the most phlegmatic super-ego. It's the old story of the "will-we's"; will we or won't we ever have a baby.

Sharing a converted Westport barn with a myriad of more or less young marrieds, Richard Widmark and Doris Day, whose frenetic attempts to beget offspring conjure up images of primitive fertility rites.

"We're trying everything," comments Doris to a prolific neighbour Gig Young. "We're going to exhaust every possibility."

So when her temperature goes up, they go down, but to no avail. In desperation, they consult an adoption agency with the unusual result that hubby is soon engaged in some extra-marital cultivation with a co-operative young social worker (Gia Scala). Ultimately, it all winds up with one of those little coincidences necessary to full implausibility.

What little humour there is in this blatantly contrived situation is too rubber-legged to stand without constant support, and Gig Young is kept much too busy propping it up with lecherous rears and double takes. The acting throughout is passably competent, although traditional tough guy Widmark does appear somewhat out of place as an inhibited reproductive failure.

Generally, this film is mildly amusing in its way, but its way is decidedly in bad taste.

Enrolment Goes Up Total Up Seven Per Cent

By KEN MARSHALL
Varsity Staff Reporter

U of T's enrolment has jumped seven percent from last year's record total according to figures released yesterday.

Biggest increase was a 60 percent rise in the registration figures for the Ontario College of Education.

But every faculty except Applied Science and Engineering and Architecture reported greater numbers of students.

Total enrolment, as of Dec. 1, was 18,813. There were 18,030 students at the university a year ago.

Only faculty to show a considerable increase was education. Number of students in Physical Health and Education climbed 20 percent from 114 to 143, while OCE totals shot up 60 percent from 273 to 426.

Dean E. C. Diltz said last night the increase occurred simply because more students wished to enter the teaching profession.

"Improved salaries, increased prestige, and generally better conditions are making teaching a very attractive career", he said.

Dean R. R. McLaughlin of SPS blamed adverse publicity concerning the availability of jobs for graduating engineers for the nine percent overall drop suffered by his faculty.

"It's true we were forced to set limits on our enrolments because of space limitations, but the enrolment in the freshmen year falls far below those limits", he said.

"We feel press reports over-playing publicity as to a shortage of high-paying jobs for graduating engineers tended to scare off a lot of prospective Skulemen", he added.

Only 532 freshmen entered SPS this year, a drop of 20 percent from last year's figure of 677.

First year enrolment at two of the four Arts colleges showed marked increase, one held steady, and the fourth dropped slightly.

University College says its freshman class now numbers 624, compared to 536 last year.

The class of 6T2 at Victoria numbers 529, while their fore-runners in 6T1 numbered only 478.

Trinity College reported its first year enrolment to be exactly the same as last year's, while St. Michael's says their freshman class numbers only 281, compared to 288 last year.

Except for the faculties of Applied Science and Engineering and Architecture, no faculties report enrolment changes substantially out of line with the general increase of seven percent.

One relatively unknown fact to emerge from the registration statistics was the School of Graduate Studies third-place ranking in the numerical size of the faculties.

SGS, with 956 full-time and 437 part-time students, has some 150 more than the fourth largest faculty, Medicine.

Arts and SPS rank first and second in the list.

Coming Of Age

By Liz Binks

Within the first hour of the first session, delegates to the Canadian University Press conference this December discovered they were treading dangerous ground.

Proposed executive and constitutional changes, though intended for the betterment of the organization, threatened to split CUP into two well-known factions — the big and the small universities.

The dissention is not a new one. In a column earlier this year, we discussed this feeling which was so prominent at the last Nfucs conference, and has been cropping up at student conferences for years.

In the case of CUP it was do or die. For 21 years the organization has been wavering between success and failure — success because it is a fine idea in principle, failure because its members never got much farther than principle, if they ever fully understood that.

A year last December, two French speaking delegates got together and framed a new constitution, one that would provide a fuller and more interpretative wire service. They felt it would do credit to Canadian university journalism and to Canadian university students in general.

The constitution was drafted too late in the session and had to be left over until this year.

And when delegates gathered again in Winnipeg many of them were new to the conference, and even more were leary of any change proposed by larger universities.

At issue was a full-time, paid president with headquarters in the Nfucs Ottawa office, who would supply news, features and editorials to papers across the country. The scheme would cost money, and to many of the smaller papers, publishing as little as twice monthly, it seemed far from worthwhile.

Because it was being pushed by McGill, Toronto and the French-speaking universities, many delegates were inclined to feel the plan was one which they must needs finance, but from which they would reap few benefits.

This was not the case at all and it is to the credit of the entire conference that the motion was not the dismal failure it could have been.

A Manitoba delegate gave one of the finest speeches on the need for a Canadian "awareness" we have heard to date.

Two other editors said they would try to finance the whole of CUP if necessary. From the far end of the conference table, in precise French tones, came an offer of $200.

Had the issue remained at the level of rival factions, it would not have been a success. But somehow delegates managed — though we still aren't sure how — to place their conflicting interests on a broader plane and to back something they were not sure of in practice but believed in in theory.

They took a chance. They still have to sell the idea — and the expense — to their students' councils and last but not least, to the students themselves.

But it is an idea worth supporting and it is an expense worth affording. Journalism today needs specialists as it has never needed them before, specialists who can popularize their field for the reading public.

University students are in an excellent position to fulfil this need in part, and by enlarging their reading audience to reach all universities in Canada, they will be enriching the profession which many of them will some day make their own.

She Shoots - Oops, She Missed Ladies' Shinny Shakes Arena Roof

By SHARON MILGRAM

That old familiar cry "He shoots—he scores!" is quickly being replaced by a new expression "She shoots—she scores!"

Yes, just as in all other walks of life, the females are invading. This time it is the ice at Varsity Arena which is feeling the female onslaught which began Wednesday afternoon when Vic I and POT I skated out on the shiny ice surface to open the women's Interfaculty Hockey Schedule.

Led by Bev Westman and Jill Segond who each scored a hat-trick (3-goals), Vic proceeded to whitewash an unorganized POT team. The final score was 8-0. Other Vic scorers were Sandy Rust and Irene Borecky with one goal apiece.

Top player for POT was their goal keeper who, despite the score, made many fine saves on the Vic players who peppered her with shots throughout the game.

Continuing the invasion on Varsity were the second teams from St. Hilda's and POT who opened the League II hockey season on Thursday afternoon.

This game also resulted in a whitewash with team from POT again being taken to the laundry. The score in this game was St. Hilda's II 6-POT II 0.

Top scorer for St. Hilda's was Laurel Ball who scored the hat-trick. Other scorers were Mary Munro (2) and Sue Hamilton (1).

This game, as the score indicated, was all St. Hilda's. They had possession of the puck for the better part of the game and when the POT team was finally able to get the puck they didn't seem to know what to do with it. The reason for that might have been that the St. Hilda's defence continually pestered the POT forwards.

With the hockey season just getting underway, the Vic I team appears to be the one to beat. It will probably get some pretty stiff competition from St. Hilda's I and Nursing II.

League III, which has yet to have any games played, will have a new team in its fold when its schedule opens bright and early (8 AM) Dec. 12. The only word out of the camp of this new team from the farm or is it from Pharmacy, well anyways, wherever it is from, is that some of their players can even skate. So other teams beware!

Other sports occupying the females' talents are badminton, basketball and volleyball. The latter two are concentrating on the choice of their intercollegiate teams which should be picked within the next few weeks.

The badminton tournament completed its third round Wednesday evening with the top sixteen girls playing for the championship Tuesday December 13 at 9 AM at the Carlton Club. The sixteen girls are: Lynne Spence (Pharm), Laurie Van Volkenburg (Vic), Barb Goodwin (St. H.), Jean Wade (Vic), Nancy Lou Campbell (PHE), Bernice Wiley (Nurs), Sue Hamilton (St. H.), Jill Segond (Vic), Ann Williams (Vic), Liz Collier (U.C.), Judith Jowsey (Nurs), Joy Mahood (PHE), Susan Harry (PHE), Gail Royce (PHE), Dorothy Vernon (St. H) and Pat Wood (POT).

The top four winners in this tournament will form the inter-collegiate will be noon Saturday for those wishing to challenge will be noon Saturday December 17.

P.S.—Watch out for New Girl's Column, to appear soon.

Interfaculty Summary

Two more UC basketball teams gained victory on the interfaculty front.

In the minor league opener, UC Beta Sigs whopped St. Mike's Grave Robbers 59-34, while UC seconds whipped Pre-Meds 42-21.

Grossman (11), and Thomas (10) led the Beta Sigs, while Matteo (18) took care of most of the Grave Robbers' scoring.

Quarrington (13), and Brokop (11), were outstanding for UC I's. Blew and Schiller shared 16 points for the Pre-Med squad.

Interfaculty hockey moves into full swing again next week. UC are currently leading Group One, with Vic I and St. Mike's close behind.

Trinity have a handsome lead in Group Two and can virtually wrap up first place when they meet Vic II's this Wednesday.

A win would be their fourth straight and would put them at least four points ahead of the pack.

Retailers, Blues Clash For Fun

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

Early Saturday afternoon, Varsity Blues will depart for Kingston. Although the road is familiar to Varsity athletes, the opposition will not be. Blues face off against the Kingston Merchants of the Eastern division, OHA Senior A loop, in exhibition hockey Saturday night.

Statistically speaking, the Slithering Grocers aren't exactly the terror of the league. However, in the last few days they have begun to move at a sizzling pace. Kingston tied the Canadian world championship reps for 59; Wednesday night. And so, either Belleville is playing poorly or Kingston is playing well.

We wish to go on record and say that should Varsity win this game, they will not be going to the world championships of 1961. They shall not even apply.

Little digs aside, the game should be a good one. Varsity have become a good gate attraction since that last little game, and it appears they may make a few more guest appearances.

Perhaps we are leaning out on the proverbial shaky limb, but we still believe an Intercollegiate all-star team can take any Senior A team to the cleaners. We admit that the Olympic rep will be padding the roster with expensive amateurs, and for a few short weeks will look like nothing in any league, but it's back-fired before in a third place finish. So at least Canada will be represented by a rich team with plenty of experience in losing.

Such a pity Kitchener has the money, Inter-collegiate teams have the better amateur players, and the CAHA has so much to say.

Wrestlers Survive American Hospitality

By MIKE CHYKALIUK
Varsity Staff Reporter

During the cool Yule some members of this University were enduring the ravages of the Cuban revolt, while others were surviving the American ordeal.

Four individuals (Rod Carrow, Bill Polito, Herb Brown and Frank Brown) also returned comparatively intact after representing Varsity in the American Open Wrestling tournament held at Wilkes' College, Pennsylvania.

The fact that these gentlemen returned at all is a tribute to their ability. They competed against the finest amateur grapplers in the States.

Regard as the "Big Daddy" of simon pure wrestling, this tournament is the largest of its kind in the world. It was held on December 29-30. Four mats used simultaneously produced some hectic action for the 1600 frenzied onlookers.

None of the Varsity wrestlers was pinned; however, all of them did lose their matches. The Toronto contingent (four wrestlers and coach Jack Amos) heartily praised the American foes.

They (The Americans) apparently wrestle competitively at high school. Since this sport is so popular it will probably be included in the High school curriculum, along with football, leathercrafts, and ceramics.

The keen spectator interest (there couldn't be 1600 relatives even in the States) was very surprising. It certainly speaks well for amateur wrestling. If 1600 can be entertained without freaks, shaven heads and wrestling bears, there may be hope for this sport yet.

The Blues, back behind the safe confines of the 49th parallel, return to action January 17 when they journey to London for a mat with the University of Western Ontario.

UC Wins Basketball Thriller

UC defeated St. Michaels 52-49 in overtime, in yesterday's interfaculty Major Basketball opener.

The game was hard fought throughout, with St. Mike's holding a 21-20 lead at the half.

The Irish pulled away to a nine point lead in the opening minutes of the second half, but they couldn't hold their margin as a determined UC squad slowly closed the gap with some accurate shooting.

With three seconds remaining in regulation time, SMC held a 48-47 lead, but Max Schaeffer of UC was fouled and given two chances to tie the score.

His first shot missed, but was disallowed, and he still had two chances. The second went home to tie the score, but the last was off the mark.

The overtime period featured possession type basketball, and close checking. UC netted four points to the Irish single and thus earned the victory.

The Redmen were without their regular coach, Norm

Menzel, who is in Florida with the touring Blues. Sid Linden has filled in during his absence.

UC: Wowohuk, 14; Winch, 8; Muir, 8; Wyles, 5; Bogomondy, 5; McKechnie, 5; Wengle, 3; Schaeffer, 3; Linden, 2; Total, 52.

SMC: Girdlestone, 12; Crouse, 8; Regan, 6; Kostlyk, 6; Obrenesvor, 5; Nicholas, 4; Syron, 3; Brandon, 2; McGivney, 2; Luka, 1; Total, 49.

A large and appreciative crowd watched the game, played in the Hart House gym.

Over martinis in Manhattan (a dubious mixture) they're probably still talking about the $1607.44 gamble that brought bedlam to Baltimore and gloom to Jim Lee Howell and his New York Giant football team.

Giants — epitomized in an aging veteran called Charley Conerly — were sitting down to pull on the glass slipper that Cinderella made famous when halfback Frank Gifford slammed into the Baltimore Colt line for what could have produced the first down to give New York the National Football League title back on December 28.

Giants were ahead, 17-14, with the clock running out in the fourth quarter. The ball was placed inches' short of a first down, and Coach Howell elected to kick from his own 43-yard line rather than gamble for yardage.

Don Chandler hoisted a terrific punt to the Colt 14-yard line, from which it took quarterback Johnny Unitas only a handful of plays to move his team to the New York 20. That's where Steve Myrha stood to kick his electrifying field goal that tied the game.

From there, it's an old story: Colts got the ball in the unprecedented overtime session, and capped a drive when Alan (The Horse) Ameche plunged from the Giant one for the game-winning score.

Afterwards, Coach Howell explained he had never had the slightest doubt as to what move to make in the crucial play.

"If we don't make the first down, then they are in a spot to move up for the tying field goal. Chandler is the best kicker in the league and he got off a good one too.

"But we couldn't contain them and they went all the way to tie it up. When you can't hold them, you can't win. They deserved it and we have no alibis." He said.

To disagree with the experts is easy, and particularly common with the arm-chair quarterbacks who couldn't make it to Yankee Stadium for the finale.

But with a running backfield that included Mel Triplett, ex-Montreal Alouette Alex Webster, and Gifford, it seemed odd that Howell would choose to surrender possession of the ball (a certainty with the U.S. "fair catch" on punts).

Because, to a great offensive team like Baltimore, with Unitas arials to Ray Berry, Lenny Moore, Jim Mutcheller, handoffs to L. G. Dupre, Ameche, and with the chips down, 30 or 40 yards make little difference.

It was, nevertheless, a fine game of football to watch (and an extra-special Happy New Year to the NBC-TV technician who fixed that broken cable in the overtime session) and a fine victory for Weeb Ewbank and his Colts from Maryland.

Each Baltimore team member pocketed $4,718.77 and each Giant carted $3,111.33 home to the missus. (A far, far cry from the chopped peanuts they split up between our Grey Cup finalists each November).

But there's at least one Giant who figured he was short-changed. Gifford, who failed to gain the necessary yardage before Giants surrendered the ball at the turning point, said afterwards he thought he had made the first down.

An Associated Press dispatch following the game made mention of this, but pointed out that "the other Giants weren't arguing." That seems reasonable, because it was Gifford who had a couple of costly errors for which to atone:

Both were fumbles. The first gave Baltimore the pigskin on the Giant 20, and Ameche capped a short drive with Colts' first TD from the two-yard line. That was in the second quarter.

The second bobble handed Baltimore the ball on the Colt 10-yard line, and Unitas moved his cowboys 86 yards in 14 plays, capping it with a 15-yard pass to Berry for the score and a 14-3 half-time lead.

Gifford is a great athlete, and one of the prime reasons New York found themselves in the NFL final. Even a trace of sour grapes does not mix well.

COLT CHEER — GIANT GLOOM

Alan Ameche, appearing on the Ed Sullivan Show after the game, brought to mind he's related to Don Ameche of Hollywood fame . . . the Colt win was disturbing for at least two Baltimore citizens . . . one drove his car into a hydro pole during the excitement of Myrha's tying placement . . . another leaped skyward and smashed his hand into a light bulb . . . some 30,000 jammed Baltimore's Friendship Airport to welcome the team home — and what could be a more appropriate name for the occasion?

It was part of the closing chapter in American grid action for 1958, a year soured only by the sudden dismissal of Notre Dame coach Terry Brennan . . . Yankee sportswriters regarded the move as a sudden trick engineered and pressured by a win-hungry group of alumni . . . have the Fighting Irish of Notre Dame given way to the Sickening Grasp of the Almighty Dollar?

Back to the NFL for a moment . . . wouldn't Casey Stengel and the rest of his world champions consider it paeic justice that defeat should come to a New York team bearing the nickname Giants who had the audacity to play in Yankee Stadium?

Nfcus Opposes Exchange Plans

OTTAWA—CUP—Plans for a large-scale exchange of commonwealth students was opposed Wednesday by the president of the National Federation of Canadian University Students.

Nfcus president Mortimer Bistrisky said a national system of scholarships and bursaries for Canadian students at home would have to come first.

Nfcus would protest the idea unless it came as an addition to the bursary plan, he said.

Nfcus executive will seek an interview with Prime Minister Diefenbaker March 5—National University Student day—to discuss government views of the Nfcus scholarship brief submitted last year.

The brief suggests a national fund to cover 10,000 annual bursaries worth $550 each—the average difference between cost of education and what the student can provide.

Battle Flares Up Again

WINNIPEG—CUP—Prof. Harry Crowe has charged that United College's former principal Dr. W. C. Lockhart "knows very well the letter" over which Crowe was fired and Lockhart resigned "was stolen from the mail."

Crowe was replying to a challenge by Dr. Lockhart in Toronto over the weekend that he prove his claim the letter which led to his firing had been stolen.

Dr. Lockhart had said detectives here had found no evidence of mail tampering and were of the opinion that Prof. W. A. Packer to whom the letter was addressed had lost it before opening it.

Prof. Crowe Tuesday morning charged Dr. Lockhart "seems bent upon the deliberate creation of mischief".

Prof. Packer yesterday reaffirmed he had never received the letter and Winnipeg Police Chief Robert Taft said he had no idea where Dr. Lockhart got grounds for his charges.

Prof. Crowe was fired from his United College teaching post in September and rehired Dec. 15. Dr. Lockhart has resigned, effective June 1.

Tree Snatch, UC Break-In, Causes

The University of Toronto's supreme disciplinary body, the Caput, has imposed $50 fines on five members of Delta Tau Delta fraternity, and suspended from university for a year a member of Zeta Psi.

The Caput also announced it will consider the relation between fraternities and the university after imposing the punishments at a meeting last Saturday.

Fined and suspended from tenure of office in university organizations for the academic year 1959-60 for their part in the removal Dec. 17 of a Christmas tree erected by the Engineering Society are the following members of Delta Tau Delta:

Robert Ross, III SPS;
Hugh Thomson, III SPS;
Peter Gourley, I Arch.;
J. C. G. Dobbie, I Vic.; and William Danyluk, III Pharm.

Angus M. Macdonald, a graduate student in business administration and a member of Zeta Psi fraternity, was suspended from university for the academic year 1958-59 for breaking into University College women's residence, Whitney Hall, early on the morning of Dec. 10.

In the statement, the Caput said it had "decided to consider the general question of the relations existing between Fraternities and the University."

Circumstances in the case of the Christmas tree, the Caput said in a statement issued yesterday, "showed it to be one of vandalism."

The five students fined $50 each, are required to give up immediately any offices they hold in university organizations. The Caput also recommended that college and faculty efforts concerned be advised and restrict the five from participation in college and faculty organizations.

In consideration of the five students concerned with removing the Christmas tree, the statement said, "evidence was brought to suggest that the remainder of the Engineering Society's Christmas tree, had been removed by a group of other students of the University to their Fraternity House."

Regarding the incidents, Student Administrative Council president Vince Kelly said last night "students have come to accept this sort of vandalism as a typical student prank."

"This thinking is so prevalent," he said, "the students involved do not meet with condemnation on the part of other students as they should."

Charges Denied

Fraternities Called Noisy

University of Toronto fraternity members last night denied reports that their parties were unusually noisy.

The reports, printed in a Toronto daily last Friday, quoted a resident of the East Annex as saying "living beside a fraternity house is worse than being next door to a factory".

The charge was made at a meeting of the East Annex Neighbourhood Association last Thursday. About 50 members of the association met informally to present their views on the recently completed East Annex report on zoning and redevelopment to Deputy Commissioner Walter Manthorpe of the city's planning board.

Residents of the area told Mr. Manthorpe they have worked out a system to use when a fraternity party is in progress.

"There is only one control on a fraternity — the police force and it's a nuisance to always be on the phone to the police," the unidentified resident said.

He said the noise got so bad about 10 p.m. every night that tenants of his apartment building worked out a schedule and took turns complaining to police.

"They got a call every ten minutes," he said.

Members of one fraternity on St. George St. north of Bloor said last night "the apartment dwellers are noisier on football weekends than we are at our parties. We confine our noise to the basement recreation room. They open their balcony doors and let everyone hear them."

"We have not had a complaint from our neighbours in the last two years", the house manager said.

The wife of the janitor for the adjacent apartment building confirmed the fraternity's stand.

"They aren't really noisy", she said. "Perhaps the residents here are noisier themselves on occasions".

"The report suggests a certain type of zoning which would give the fraternities special privileges in specified areas close to the university", Mr. Manthorpe said last night.

"The suggestion received some opposition from people who might continue to live in the area, and that's all the headlines were talking about," he said.

At present 11 fraternities are situated in the area. Some 30 fraternities are expected to move to the area within the next few years. They will be forced to leave their present locations along St. George St. to provide room for the university's expansion program.

Seek Settlement On Tree Felling

A group from the U of T's Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity hopes to settle out of court for damages resulting from a tree-cutting incident late last term, one of the group said last night.

The group "about nine or ten" in number, were booked by North York township police after being found with two Christmas trees and a number of real estate signs, the source said.

One of the trees was not from anyone's personal property, the source said. The owner of the other, a tree-top removed from a tree on Willowdale-area property, has lodged a complaint with North York police, the student added.

The group has approached the man offering compensation for the tree-top, the source added. He said he was under the impression police would not take further action if the complaint were dropped.

The source stressed that the question of drinking never entered the picture. No drinking charges were laid by police, he said.

Students' Administrative Council president Vince Kelly last night said the U of T Caput plans no action on the matter.

Lambda Chi president Ray Blahay last night said, "I feel the kids have been persecuted enough. You guys (the news-papers) have been bugging them enough."

He had no further comment on the incident.

Diefenbaker Here Tonight

Canada's Prime Minister tonight will make his first public address since his round the world trip late last year.

Rt. Hon. John G. Diefenbaker will deliver the speech at a special U of T Convocation where he will be awarded the degree of Doctor of Laws honoris causa.

After the opening prayer by University Chaplain Rev. A. B. B. Moore of Victoria University, President Claude Bissell will present Mr. Diefenbaker to the Chancellor of the University, Dr. Samuel Beatty, and read the citation.

Chancellor Beatty will then confer the degree upon the Prime Minister.

The topic of Mr. Diefenbaker's address, expected to last about 45 minutes, has not been released.

SAC officials said last night only a few of the 400 tickets allotted for students are still available.

Tickets will be distributed on a strictly "first come, first served" basis, and may be picked up at the SAC office between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. today.

Mr. Diefenbaker's speech will be broadcast over local radio stations at 8:15 p.m.

Campus Tories say they have planned no special ceremonies to mark the Diefenbaker visit.

"Mr. Diefenbaker's very full schedule has precluded any special events to honor his visit," Jeremy Johnston (IV Trin.), Model Parliament Prime Minister, said last night.

The special Convocation will get underway at 8 p.m.

Open Festival

Plays by Tennessee Williams, Ionesco and Chekhov will kick off the annual U of T Drama Committee two-day festival of one-act plays tonight.

The festival, tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 p.m., will feature five plays. Araby Lockhart will be adjudicator.

Tonight's offerings are Williams' "Auto-da-fe", Ionesco's "The Lesson" and Chekhov's "On the High Road."

Tomorrow evening will see performances of Bergson's "The Birthday Party" and Beckett's "Endgame."

Tickets, 75 cents each, are available at the Hart House Box Office. Plays will be presented in the Hart House Theatre fraternity discipline

Relations between fraternities and this newspaper have seldom been cordial. In the past we have criticized fraternities, individually and en masse, for nearly every principle and practice connected with the idea of a selective semi-secret, socially oriented organization existing above and beyond the general level of university life.

Such criticism is not our intention now. Whatever our personal feelings may be, it is not the policy of this paper to oppose in any way the principles of fraternal societies. Indeed this year we had hoped, because of the sensitivity of the subject for many tender consciences, that fraternities would not have to be mentioned at all.

Unfortunately, as today's news reveals, the malpractices of several groups of students operating out of fraternities have caused the spotlight of publicity to centre on fraternities with a vengeance.

The fraternity problem breaks into two separate categories. The first is the general problem of disturbing the community's peace and quiet. The second is far more important and concerns the entire aspect of fraternity discipline and the relationship between fraternities and the University of Toronto.

The first problem arises out of the prospect of a mass migration of some 30 fraternity houses into the residential area north of Bloor Street. The indications are the residents of the area are appalled at the prospect. We cannot altogether blame them. At the moment the disturbance issue is not an important one. The houses are situated on the same street and the only people who can really complain about noise are other fraternities. The future, however, looks dim.

The second problem threatens the whole foundation of fraternities: the apparent absence of discipline and the arrogant denial of responsibility among some groups of fraternity brothers.

The pages of this newspaper have been weighed down with stories of separate acts of vandalism committed this year by fraternity members. The acts have been distinguished by their vicious disregard for other people's time, property and money. They have been made further distasteful by the general tendency of the vandals to boast and gloat about their exploits after the event.

Fraternities on this campus exist in a vacuum of responsibility. Their only source of discipline comes from house executives and, ultimately, from the alumni. House executives function within varying degrees of ineffectuality and sometimes condone the acts of vandalism or protect the culprits from punishment by the university.

The concept that money will compensate for any destruction caused by fraternity members seems to be a general principle upon which fraternities operate. Obviously, it will not.

Furthermore, as has been pointed out many times before, it is seldom the reputation of the fraternity which is damaged by these actions, it is usually the reputation of the University of Toronto.

Last year a sub-committee of the Students' Administrative Council met with heads of fraternities to consider an Inter-Fraternity Council of fraternity presidents which would work together to solve the problems of relocation and discipline. According to the report, the loudest reaction from fraternity presidents to the challenge that fraternities were drifting away from the university was: "So what!" These presidents were opposed to any unified body because "the Administration would strangle us with it." They agreed it would be far better to maintain the status quo than to risk losing their autonomy.

The Caput seems to have lost patience with fraternities, and here it must be admitted that the whole is suffering by reputation for the misdeeds of the parts. It is well within the realm of possibility that the Caput committee appointed to investigate fraternities will recommend their complete abolition. A similar move was made by Queen's more than 30 years ago.

By refusing to co-operate with the university and risk losing their autonomy, the fraternities are rapidly discouraging any sympathy with their existence.

The Caput Statement

At its meeting on Saturday, January 10th, the Caput considered the case of Angus M. Macdonald, a graduate student in the Institute of Business Administration, who broke into Whitney Hall in the early morning of December 10, 1958. Mr. Macdonald was a member of a Fraternity House. The Caput decided to suspend him from the University until the end of the academic session 1958-59.

At the same meeting, the Caput also considered the cases of the following undergraduate students in the University:

(1) R. Ross and (2) H. Thomson, Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering; (3) P. Gourley, Faculty of Architecture; (4) J. C. G. Dobbie, Victoria College; W. Danyluk, Faculty of Pharmacy.

On December 17, 1958, the above students cut down and removed to their Fraternity House the top of a Christmas tree belonging to the Engineering Society. The Caput considered that the circumstances of the case showed it to be one of vandalism, and decided to fine each of the above students the sum of $50.00. They also resolved to debar them from holding office in any University organization until the end of the academic session 1959-60, and to require them to resign immediately from any such office that they might presently be holding. It was also resolved to recommend to the College and Faculty authorities concerned that they take similar action regarding the participation of the above students in College and Faculty organizations.

During the consideration of the second case, evidence was brought to suggest that the remainder of the Engineering Society's Christmas tree, together with the decorations of the tree, had been removed by a group of other students of the University to their Fraternity House. The Caput decided to take early action to examine the individuals who appeared to be concerned.

The Caput also decided to consider the general question of the relations existing between Fraternities and the University.

Assistant Registrar

Our Readers Write

Dear Sir:

If apathy does exist in St. Michael's it can and should be condemned, but to make apathy a whipping-post for the lack of vitality of any or all organizations would be a blind and unconsidered generalization.

The St. Michael's Writers' Group and The Gryphon have existed in previous years because small groups of students in the college have had a vital interest in creative writing and a fine individual talent for it. It is possible that we have now reached a point where there are no longer at St. Michael's enough under-graduates with the necessary interest and aptitude for writing, to make the Writers' Group succeed. There certainly are students who show a real interest in the activities of the group, but if these people do not have the necessary creative ability to produce creative prose and verse, the group and the magazine will die. No matter what the interest, unless there is writing to read and discuss, and to publish, there can be no group and no magazine, and it would be more pathetic to try to put out a 'dead' magazine, simply because of the tradition involved, than to let the magazine die for a little while.

And, if the magazine should not be published this year, this would by no means be the end of creative writing in this college. Soon there would be new students attending the college who could direct both their interests and their talents to this field, and for these students the group and the magazine will again fill a real need.

Undefeated In Senior A

Kingston, Jan. 10—Competing for the first time in three weeks, Varsity Blues bounced from behind to earn a 3-3 draw with Kingston Merchants, in exhibition hockey here tonight.

Nearly 1500 home town fans attended the contest, fully expecting to see the local heroes wallop

Blues, but left the arena giving thanks Merchants could salvage the tie.

In the first period, Blues obviously shaky from the layoff, held Kingston to a scoreless tie. Goalie Ray Dunn came up with some sparkling net-minding, kicking out 12 shots, several of which had score written all over them.

True to form, Blues suffered a bad second period, trailing 3-1 when it was all over. Ron Casey opened scoring for Varsity at 3:10 of the frame, on an unassisted play. Casey had been moved from his customary position on the blue line, to the left wing slot on a line with Bill Kennedy and Dunc Brodie. This unit performed very well, garnering all three Blues' goals.

Kingston came back with three quick markers in five minutes to take care of all their scoring for the game. A rash of penalties saw Blues playing two men short for nearly five minutes, although oddly enough Merchants scored only one goal while Varsity were short handed.

A flare-up between Blues' Doug Williams and Kingston's Ted Toppazzini nearly ended in a serious fiasco. When the smoke had cleared Bep Guidolin of Merchants and Blues' Neil Munro were also tagged with majors for fighting.

The loyal Kingston -andom showered both teams with tokens of their esteem. The ice was littered with programs, bottle tops, candy wrappers, and a solitary banana.

Scorewise the third period belonged exclusively to Varsity. On a pretty passing play with Bear Kennedy and Harry Neale, Casey scored his second goal at 1:45.

Kennedy's unassisted tying marker was the highlight of the contest. Breaking away at centre ice, Kennedy swooped around a surprised Kingston defense to beat goalie Lynn Davis with a low, hard shot.

It was only Davis' adept work in the nets that prevented Varsity from running their score to six goals in the final ten minutes of play. Grant Mills, who played a good game throughout, was foiled on a perfectly-executed passing play with linemates Mike Elik and John Macdonald.

Blues' play throughout the game did much to convince all who were sceptical, that Varsity are capable of playing in Senior A competition, and what is more significant, winning. Varsity were outshot only in the first period, when they suffered from plain, old-fashioned rustiness. A larger, much wider playing surface, prevented the team from getting unravelled.

Did you know Varsity Blues have every right to challenge for the Allen Cup?

SMC Invites Pair:

Call Fidel Castro

St. Mike's has paged Cuban rebel Fidel Castro and exiled dictator Batista asking them to attend the college's bookshow "The Dedicated Men" Jan. 29.

The show's originator, Gino Matteo, has had no reply to telegrams sent last week to the Cubans. The telegram to Castro congratulated him on his recent victory, but Batista's message omitted all mention of recent events in Cuba.

Tickets for the original musical comedy go on sale today in the SMC rotunda. Travelling booths will be set up in faculties and colleges next week. Cost of a single ticket is $1.

The show deals with the trials of two male undergraduates who join forces with a Frenchman in the student body to promote better coeducational relations in an imaginary Canadian college.

A 20-member chorus line includes a calypso group from Trinidad. Three male and three female leads complete the cast. The calypso group will tour campus residences before the show's opening.

The 2½ hour show is directed by Dawn Egan and produced by Douglas Hill. Gino Matteo wrote the script and lyrics, and Jim Doris wrote the score.

SMC produced its first musical, a college revue, last year. Matteo last night said producing "The Dedicated Men" was an "ambitious move" for the college.

In rejecting the traditional college revue creators are trying to "give the students something different, something unexpected," he said.

The show will run at the Royal Ontario Museum theatre Jan. 29-31.

Old Maritime College Makes Big Fund Plea

One of Canada's oldest universities is making a national appeal for funds.

Dr. Colin B. MacKay, Canada's youngest university president, explained the plight of his university in Toronto last week.

Needed is $3,200 to enlarge existing facilities, many of which are greatly overcrowded now, he said.

Dr. MacKay specifically appealed to Ontario industry to contribute the $500,000 necessary for new student residences. Existing residence facilities must be doubled, Dr. MacKay said.

Graduates of the university included J. H. Smith, president of Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd.; Lord Beaverbrook, British newspaper tycoon; and two Canadian literary giants, Sir Charles G. D. Roberts, and Bliss Carman.

Founded in 1785, UNB has established 16 degree-granting institutions. It is the oldest university east of Quebec and grants doctorate degrees.

Dr. MacKay, stressing the necessity of continued expansion, told reporters that the government of New Brunswick will match, dollar for dollar, the funds which the university committee collects.

Troubles Loom...

Jargon Contributions Slow

U of T's student literary magazine shows signs of becoming a collection of pieces printed verbatim from other campus publications, editor John Robert Colombo said last night.

Colombo has received seven contributions for "Jargon" to date, and deadline for submissions is Feb. 1.

"I want to put out a half-decent magazine—I don't want to reprint," Colombo said.

The seven contributions include two from foreign students.

Professional faculties predominate in the entries.

No critical reviews have been received and there are no submissions from graduate English students, Colombo said.

"The effort involved in printing a literary magazine would be wasted unless contributions are forthcoming," he said. "I think the Students' Administrative Council would and should reconsider publishing Jargon if the quality is not high enough."

"If anyone wants to write, this is the only way to do it. Publication is an integral part of writing," Colombo said.

Copies of Jargon will be sent coast to coast to critics, reviewers and libraries. The magazine will be designed by Harold D. Kurschenski from the U of T Press, and financed jointly by SAC and arts colleges and professional faculties.

Colombo said if reprints were necessary to fill the magazine, "it would mean colleges like University College would predominate. This would be an unfortunate situation," he said.

Hya, Yaka!

Dental Book Going Strong

An enthusiastic Harold Marcus, Dental Society publications chairman, says graduate response to a fund appeal for this year's Hya Yaka, a yearbook this year turned dental history, has so far been "excellent."

The book, Marcus said, will be released in October, marking the opening of the Dental College's new building on the corner of Huron and College streets.

He said this year's book marks the end of the college's 50 years in its present College St. building west of the Public Library.

The publications chairman said about 3,000 graduates from the school now living "all the way from British Columbia to Newfoundland" have been approached for orders and material. About half have placed orders so far and material is also pouring in.

"Already," Marcus said, "we've got enough money to put out a book half the size of Torontonian without even asking for ads."

But Marcus expects the finished work to "put Torontonian to shame."

"It's the kind of thing that even the layman would get a tremendous kick out of," he said. "It's the greatest."

He said the book will contain pictures of the old buildings, the equipment used when the school first began and many of the men who have gone through the school, including several of the present professors — when they were students.

The book has been divided into two sections. One, edited directly by Marcus, is a record of the school year 1958-9. The other, under the direction of co-editor Ed Gazo, will be a history of the school and its predecessor, the Royal College of Dental Surgeons.

Dr. Joseph Johnson of the faculty is serving as archivist for the work, which has been called the first history of Ontario dental education ever published.

Price for the book to graduates is $5.

Parliament Opens Tonight

U of T's Model Parliament kicks off at 8 p.m. tonight—and Hon. Roland Michener, speaker of the federal House of Commons should be there rain or shine, Model Parliament committee chairman Sue Davis said last night.

When Mr. Michener was originally asked to be speaker of the Model Parliament, he accepted on condition that weather would allow him to take a plane rather than a train to Ottawa afterwards.

Now, Miss Davis said, she has been informed the parliamentarian will be there "even if he has to take the train."

Miss Davis added campus Progressive Conservatives have told her they will not be introducing a foreign affairs bill in the parliament. They will introduce a foreign affairs resolution Thursday.

Because of Model Parliament regulations, Miss Davis said, she doubts if the resolution will be released by campus PC's until Monday.

Miss Davis said she thought the campus Liberal and OCF parties would provide "a good opposition" to the PC government in the parliament.

She hopes for debate on "issues instead of procedures" she said.

Prime minister Jeremy Johnston last night released names of last-minute appointments to the PC cabinet. Tom Strachan (I Vic) becomes postmaster-general; Murray Woodside (III SPS), minister of national revenue and Pete Gilbert (IV Arch), transport minister.

Johnston had no further comment to make on the parliament. "I think I'll save it for the speech from the throne," he said.

Parliament sessions are: tonight, Wednesday and Thursday from 8-10.30 p.m., Wednesday and Thursday from 4.30-5.45 p.m.

Sessions will be in the Ontario legislative chambers in Queens' Park. Those sitting in the parliament are asked to arrive 15 minutes before the sessions begin.

The legislative chambers are equipped with visitors' galleries and parliament officials hope to see a good spectator turn-out.

Enrolment Up At OCE

The dean of the Ontario College of Education last night said he could see no reason why OCE's enrolment "would not increase at its present high rate for some time".

Figures released by the U of T Register last week indicated that OCE's enrolment this year had jumped some 60 per cent over last year's figures.

Four hundred and twenty-six students are registered in the education college this year. Only 273 attended OCE classes last year.

"Better working conditions, better salaries and a greater challenge in the field of leadership have made teaching more appealing," he said.

He advanced the present condition of the labor market and the decrease in jobs offering starting salaries comparable to those offered in the teaching profession as further reasons for a continued increase in OCE enrolment.

Prove Beliefs, Ideals Dief Tells Convocation

By ED ROBERTS
Varsity Staff Reporter

Canada's Prime Minister last night called on the nations of the free world to meet together to exchange ideas and reach a common basis for a declaration of freedom's creed, in the same way as the Atlantic Charter "was a declaration of the beliefs which inspired men in the dark days of the last great war."

The Rt. Hon. John G. Diefenbaker issued his call at a special University of Toronto Convocation where he was presented with the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws by Chancellor Dr. Samuel Beatty.

In an emotionally-charged account of the views and impressions he formed on his recent around-the-world tour the Prime Minister presented his beliefs as to what the free world must do if it was to survive the threat of communism.

"Criticizing communism is not enough," he said. "A knowledge of freedom's aims is necessary so that uncommitted peoples can understand their worth and superiority when compared to communism".

He pointed out that one of the strongest impressions he received on his tour was how little people of the uncommitted countries know of the true ideals and beliefs of the free world.

"We say we believe in democracy. But the Russians have so used and perverted the word 'democracy' that it does not convey a true impression to these people," he said.

"A declaration of freedom's creed would give to the uncommitted world a solemn pledge of willingness to work with them for the better economic conditions in which human dignity, freedom of thought, expression, association and religious pledges to those who will join in freedom and for freedom in the struggle for men's hearts and minds about can survive".

"Without these all man's words and works are as nothing", he said.

In his first major public address since his return from his tour, the Prime Minister also called for greater and more frequent interchange of students between Canada and the other nations of the free world and the uncommitted countries, and the establishment of chairs for the study of Asian History and Affairs, and of Commonwealth relationships in Canadian universities.

The citation for the degree, the 18th honorary degree Mr. Diefenbaker has received, compared the Prime Minister to Canada's first Prime Minister, Sir John A. Macdonald.

"Sir John A.'s vision of Canada, a Canada welded into unity by the determination of its people, a Canada with ample resources awaiting only the summons of enterprise and imagination, this vision sustained his party and inspired his country," the citation read.

"John George Diefenbaker is the heir clear and apparent of Sir John A. Macdonald".

"... He belongs to the Canadian West, and his conservatism is worn with a dashing, western cut. He takes his place with an impressive succession of states and dedicated leaders from the West who have found in political activity an outlet for their idealism and their sense of mission."

The full pomp and circumstance of a Convocation lent an air of grave dignity and respect to the ceremony. The long rows of faculty members, resplendent in their hoods and gowns the centuries of tradition symbolized by the heavy mace, and the massive accumulation of wisdom and experience represented by the official party were not unusual; the man receiving the degree was.

Museum Planning Big Exhibition of Masks

The Royal Ontario Museum will present an exhibition entitled "Masks: The Many Faces of Man." This is the second exhibition of international importance that the museum has undertaken.

Last year the English Silver Exhibition received wide acclaim as the most important art exhibition ever organized in Canada.

The new show will open to the public on Feb. 11 and will close on April 5. Plans for the exhibition began over a year ago.

A report from the museum states that 175 masks have been selected from thousands. Many are related to human sacrifice, black magic, witch doctors, fertility rites, and secret societies.

One Aztec mask was worn by an ancient priest as he tore out the victim's heart to present it to the Sun God. Another was on exhibit in a court trial in Southern Rhodesia only a few years ago when a "leopard man" was sentenced to death for a ritual murder.

Many of the masks were used in comic festivals, in drama, in hunting or war. Others are associated with royal burials and social position.

The exhibition will show that the idea of the mask seems to be universal and will give us a better understanding of other societies and other peoples.

The Armour Court and Ming Tomb have been redesigned to house the displays.

Fraternity First To Give Blood

Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity has made the first contribution to the up coming Red Cross blood drive on campus.

Last Friday, campaign chairman Charlotte Hubbell made a plea for another location to handle the crowds of donors expected at the School of Nursing Feb. 16-20.

Then the "Dekes" decided to donate their house to the drive. Jim McCartney (IV Vic), speaking for the fraternity offered the Red Cross full use of the house including kitchen facilities. "We're a little bit worried about the fellows getting their lunches," he said. This problem was settled when Miss Hubbell told him donors receive only coffee and cookies for their pint of blood.

Miss Hubbell said she will tell Red Cross officials about the offer today. "It sounds as though they are going out of their way to help us remedy the situation of last year when people were turned away for lack of space," she said last night.

Last year crowds of donors were turned away because the Red Cross did not have the facilities to handle them. The quota expected from the university was finally lowered when officials realized they could not handle the crowds who wished to donate their blood.

Student service representatives will meet at 4.30 p.m. Monday in the Students' Administrative Council office committee room to make blood drive plans.

250 Back Music Guild

A crowd of 250 St. Mike's students turned out in Brennan Hall Sunday night and saved the college Music Guild from disaster.

The comparatively giant attendance leaves the Music Guild "set for the year". SMC Students' Administrative Council president Mike McCabe said last night.

Programs scheduled by the Guild for the rest of the year should draw large crowds. McCabe said. No council action concerning the Guild is expected, he said.

Guild officials told the SAC last week if attendance at Sunday's concert was poor, they would ask for the dissolution or "extensive reumpacking" of the organization.

The Man Who Came EARLY To Dinner

Prime Minister John Diefenbaker confused Hart House by coming early to dinner last night.

Scheduled to arrive at Hart House's front door at 6.25 p.m., Prime Minister and Mrs. Diefenbaker climbed casually out of a taxicab shortly after 6.10 p.m.

With no one to welcome him, Mr. Diefenbaker paused to listen to the Soldiers' Tower carillon, then strolled up the steps and into the main hall.

Students wandering out of the House gasped when they saw the man they were holding the door for was the Prime Minister of Canada. It was some moments before Hart House officials realized their guest of honor was already among them.

U of T Chancellor Samuel Beatty and Hart House Warden Joseph McCulley had planned to meet the Prime Minister and his wife at the door.

Rebuked, the guests were soon directed to the Warden's office and dinner proceeded as planned.

now we are

One day, a couple of years ago, we were driving across the Burlington Beach strip and there was an old couple hitchhiking and we picked them up and heard interesting things about the tobacco-picking trade in western Ontario.

This Christmas we were driving and saw a man standing in a snowbank and we remembered the things one reads about hitchhikers and pushed down the accelerator.

When we were younger we met a man in a bus terminal and heard the wonderful rum-smelling story of a long and garrulous life.

The last time we met a bum we remembered what the powers that be say about what drunks spend money on and passed by on the other side.

Not too long ago an expulsion from a residence or a school or perhaps a curfew hour or some other piece of bureaucracy could make us very angry.

Now it would still make us a little angry — and would strike us as a bit of damn nuisance too and we would make cracks about martyrs.

Once upon a time words like freedom and liberty and love moved us a great deal.

But now we are well on the road to becoming a Mature, Responsible Citizen.

together

The phrase "togetherness" is fast gaining ground in our language. The many media of American propaganda have been plugging the concept for months, and the word has even received the stamp of approval by appearing in the columns of TIME.

"Togetherness" is a bastard noun directed at the sociological unit known for years as "the family". It implies that families should not be broken up, that the older folk should live with the younger and the younger should benefit from the association.

"Togetherness" is thus as sound as the idea of "motherhood" and only half as restricted. One could hardly deny that it is a good thing; one can only wonder why people find it necessary to reassure themselves so by mumbling about it all the time.

And beyond this, after thinking about it for some time, we find ourselves rising to the defence of "apartness"; an obvious antithesis which implies that families should be broken up, that the younger should be removed from the influence of the older.

"Apartness" is not so bad as people think. In the first place, "apartness" provides a clear opening for "independence of character", a phenomena which is tragically absent from the modern American tradition. "Apartness", would smother the cloying progress of "momism", or "grandmomism" as the case may be. "Apartness" would revitalize the community, present us with new sets of values, and perhaps provide us with that spark of inspiration which our society needs so desperately.

Most important, "apartness" would give each new generation a chance to make its own mistakes, instead of inheriting the same bad habits of the previous one.

Some "Inside" Reflections On:

Crowe And Lockhart

Below is a good example of the frailty of history. In any given dispute there must be two sides to the story. Operating on the given, known or established and accepted facts, each side will build up its own separate theory of what actually took place. Then, each side content and satisfied that it has established truth, the issue is left for future generations to make their own choice. Until all the evidence is revealed, such issues remain coals of curiosity. They burn brightly, smoulder, flare-up periodically, and never quite go out.

A Friend Of Lockhart...

Dear Sir,

Your editorial Friday is most pertinent to the United College issue since, in my view, Dr. Lockhart has received less than justice at the hands of the Canadian academic community. However, it contains, I believe, an error of fact. You state that social coercion "was expressed by the people of Winnipeg who spread the rumour, soon after the case was made public, that Lockhart was steaming open the faculty members' mail." If you will permit an Irishism in your sober columns, there would have been no case, if the rumour had been spread only after the case became public.

Though I do not want to engender acrimonious debate and further aggravate the situation, I would like to enlarge on the above statement since my understanding of events is rather different from that of the Report of the Committee of the Canadian Association of University Teachers which is now being circulated in printed form.

Dr. Lockhart, who received Prof. Crowe's letter in an envelope addressed to himself, was, at first, undecided what action he should take. There were footmarks on it, so he assumed that it had been found on the floor, possibly by some puritanical students, and sent to him in order to damage Prof. Crowe. From Prof. Packer's evidence, it would seem that the possibility that the letter had been stolen did not occur to him. After seeking the advice of a friend, Lockhart decided to pass the original on to Prof. Packer to whom it had been addressed, to keep a copy for the protection of himself and the College since he did not know what use would be made of the letter, or of his presumed knowledge of its contents, by the person or persons who had sent it to him, and to forget about it. He informed Prof. Crowe what had happened and what he had inferred about Prof. Crowe's attitude to the College. His letter began "Dear Harry" which is not a mode of address commonly used by a principal when he demands a resignation. As far as Lockhart was concerned that was the end of the matter. He left Winnipeg for two weeks.

On the day of his return, he was telephoned by a newspaper man and by a member of the Board of Regents who wished to verify a widespread rumour that he was steaming open the mail of faculty members. This rumour, which has been traced back as far as a cocktail party at which some members of the United College faculty were present, together with the inference of Prof. Crowe's friends that Lockhart intended to use the letter as a weapon against him, were the chief causes of the succeeding chain of events in which each side acted in what it regarded as the best interests of the academic community but at almost each stage misjudged the intentions and reactions of the other.

When Prof. Crowe received Dr. Lockhart's letter there were, in my opinion, only two proper courses open to him, (a) to immediately reply denying Lockhart's inferences, or (b) admit their truth and resign and, if he wished, publish the reasons for his resignation. That he did neither, and confirmed Lockhart in his opinion, was due to the fact that the lawyer friend whom he had asked to negotiate on his behalf felt that only harm could come from long-distance impersonal communications. Unfortunately, his first direct response was a wire to the Board two weeks later, after the above rumour was circulating, threatening to publicly denounce Lockhart and the Board with committing an actionable breach of copyright. This put the issue on a legal basis and thereafter the Board, on which there are several lawyers, concerned that its actions should be strictly legal, was quite unimpressed by the sensitivity of the university community on matters of academic freedom and tenure. It is my impression that this error, which the Board has admitted, was more an error of the legal mind than of the business mind as some have alleged. I am not convinced that the culpability of the Board in transgressing academic freedom is nearly as grave as the CAUT Report pretends, but am rather inclined to agree with the majority of the faculty of United College who regard academic freedom as an irrelevant issue. The error of the CAUT was caused by the refusal of the Board to appear before our Investigating Committee on the grounds that the constitution of the Committee and previous actions of the President of the CAUT precluded the possibility of fairness and impartiality.

It seems to me that the principal parties to the dispute — the Board, Dr. Lockhart, Prof. Crowe and his friends, the Executive of the CAUT, and the Headquarters of the United Church of Canada — have all made mistakes. Until they stop pointing out the errors of others and admit their own faults there will be no peace at United College. So far, only the Board and Dr. Lockhart have admitted error or the possibility of error.

... A Friend Of Crowe

As a former student of Professor Crowe's and a close personal friend, I cannot claim to be objective, nor can I share the views of those who claim that Crowe was always a troublemaker, poor lecturer and scholar who should have been gotten rid of earlier.

In fact, it was precisely because of the excellent academic reputation of Professors Crowe, Reid, and McNaught that I and many others chose to attend United College rather than the main campus.

As for the notion that Harry Crowe, "trouble maker", precipitated the crisis and prevented "conciliation" by his intemperate desire to obtain headlines, nothing could possibly be further from the truth.

What the public fails to realize is that this affair is not a sudden bolt from the blue but has its roots in the past, nor is the controversy simply one between secularists and theologians. As a matter of fact Dr.

Graham, Dr. Lockhart's predecessor, a theologian and well-known Biblical scholar, hired Professor Crowe in the first place, presumably agreeing with most scholars that a liberal arts college should not only tolerate but welcome dissent, non-conformity, and originality. Dr. Lockhart, it seems, viewed United College as primarily a church college in which the teaching staff would be obliged to submerge such temporal desires as higher salaries and academic eccentricities for more spiritual considerations. Thus from 1956, when Lockhart arrived, to 1958, a tense atmosphere pervaded United College.

No one doubts that Dr. Lockhart received the letter from an anonymous source, nor do most people question Dr. Lockhart's sincerity in stating that he read it inadvertently. But his explanations of his subsequent conduct seem a bit tenuous.

The explanation that the photostat was taken as a protective measure ignores the fact that the interceptor desired to remain anonymous and could ill-afford to reveal himself. In any event Dr. Lockhart and the Board had been on excellent terms from the very beginning and he had nothing to fear from that quarter. In addition, negotiations between Crowe and the Board had been going on for at least three months preceding the first press release. All Professor Crowe desired was the retention of his job. In my opinion, Professor Crowe lost his job because his intellectual position differed from Mrs. Lockhart and Watson.

The issue now is the preservation of United College. Professor Crowe who has spent the greater part of his life at the college has always had that idea in mind. It has not been he who has of late been raking up coals.

Speaking OF SPORT

As of so much to this issue, The Varsity will present a weekly sports column by someone other than the over-looked, underpaid Sports Editor, Mike Chykaliuk — ex-professional wrestler, champion football Blues, and now Varsity staff reporter. Kicks off the series of guest editorials. Associate sports editor Gene Güst takes over the reins, a new team tomorrow.

By MIKE CHYKALIUK

Only 1600 fans attending the top amateur wrestling tournament in the States proved that the sport is in dire need of a shot in the arm. Why do hundreds of fine athletes working in four rings draw so few when eight professionals, plus the odd animal, average seven thousand at Maple Leaf Gardens?

The purpose of the sport — to press an opponent's two shoulders simultaneously to the mat while using no hold or situation which would cause injury to life or limb — is still the same.

The professionals do offer more excitement, synthetic or otherwise, and they do pin each other. Though appearing unnecessarily brutal they are unbelievably humane, as witnessed by the low injury rate.

The Simon pures, who incidentally are better wrestlers, offer little action and fewer pins. They wrestle only ten minutes.

Points are awarded for take downs, reverses, and near falls. A pin, naturally, ends the match.

With this time limit and the system of scoring, not too unlike the one used by certain college professors, onlookers don't know (or care) what is going on.

Wrestlers often merrily ride each other to maintain the point lead or the time advantage. In this maneuver they resemble a pair of mountain meadow moose at mating time.

What the sport needs is a clear cut conclusion. Throw away the time limit and the points. Wrestle till one or the other is pinned.

Under existing rules, contestants are nearly exhausted after ten minutes of riding, er, wrestling. Thus, there would be little probability of long marathons. This would certainly produce a wide open, exhilarating spectator sport.

Football coach Dalt White was seen brooding because his Blues weren't invited to any of the post season bowl games. However, he brightened brilliantly (turned red) when questioned about what his Bloor Street bullies would do to the weakened league next season.

Guard Bill Hunter must have been disappointed to be omitted from the All-Star team. Bill, along with centre Nick Bruchofsky, was the most consistent blocker on the team. Oh, the perils of playing on the offensive platoon.

This season, an unprecedented number of medical students are partaking in the rough and tumble sports of football, hockey and boxing. It's a long distance away from the delicate art of delivering babies. To these sports it appears that they either makes them or they breaks them.

*I sometimes hold it half a sun
To put in words the quiet I feel
For words like nature half reveal
And half conceal the soul within.*

Legal Beagles Tackle "Lonesome Polecats"

Interfaculty Summary

University College whipped Senior Skule, 7-1, in Group One hockey play yesterday, led by two-goal performances from Warren and Gatten. Godly, Gow and Yates were the other Redmen scorers. Taylor netted the lone SPS tally.

Skule Thirds and Fourths battled to a 4-4 tie in the only other hockey tilt. Kearney counted twice for Fourths, and Clote and Booth added singles. Payne had two for Thirds, with Chapman and Oliver potting the others.

In basketball play, Skule edged Victoria Thirds, 32-30, in a close affair. Slankis and Heller hooped ten and eight respectively for Engineers, while Tai's 11 points led the losers.

Fourth Mechanical Engineering whipped Fourth Metallurgy, 51-24, in the other cage encounter. Hallas scored 19 points to lead the winners, and Oaks and Matheson contributed ten each. Ancuta and Bracken tallied eight and six respectively for the losing quintet.

Trinity A dropped Senior Skule A, 2-1, in squash play. Weynerowski and Butterfield claimed Trinity victories, while SPS' Taylor prevented the Artsmen from a clean sweep.

Varsity's lonesome polecats, the Intermediate Orphans, finally take to the ice lanes again, meeting Osgoode Hall in exhibition hockey, today at 5.30 in the Arena.

Osgoode hall appear a strong contingent, boasting several ex Blues in their lineup. George White, Ross Woods, and Bob Church are all expected to see action against their old alma-mater. Goalie John Goodwin, former member of Trinity College's Jennings Cup team will hold up the pipes for the legal beagles.

Coach Joe Kane will also dress a former Ottawa St. Pats junior star, Bob Chevrier by name.

Joe Kane himself will provide plenty of color with his presence. He was a fine athlete with both Varsity and later with Toronto Balm Beaches.

Jack Wheldrake's Intermediates will go with much the same lineup that trimmed McMaster. Sensational young netminder Bob Holliman will probably start in goal.

Starry John Gatten, who is not up with the big blue team, only because he is academically ineligible will lead the parade.

Gord Gowe, ex Windsor Spitfire has permanently joined the squad, while veterans Pete Warren/Terry Wensely, Paul Finley, Walt James, Pete Randle, Gord Frey and the whole colorful band of puckchasers will be out to play a rousing game.

The feeling has been expressed that the only reason the Rinkies were refused entry into the existing smaller college league was the fact that they were not supported by fandom as a second team. Lets put a lie to this.

The Baby Blues play very fine hockey, the admission is free, the time is 5.30. Let's drop down to rib the galloping schelsters and support the blue and white.

Sports Snaps

U of T popular and obscure art club, the Group of Five, has announced it will enter the world of sports after receiving general condemnation for its attempts to revive Dada in Canada.

'We'll show everyone,' president Ladd Vormitag said yesterday, 'we're as good as anyone else at square things.'

To prove their point, the angry club—which yesterday revealed its membership is 23—will form the Angry Five hockey club for the purpose of challenging college and faculty teams.

Nfcus Unhappy

The National Federation of Canadian University students Friday expressed "great concern" over reports that the Ontario Government has decreased the number of Dominion-Provincial bursaries available to senior undergraduates.

Reports said the number of bursaries had been curtailed because these students are approaching their earning period. The Government would like to replace their bursaries with interest-free loans.

Nfcus "views with great concern" the consequences of such a policy, feeling this would force the students to accept loans or abandon their studies," the statement said.

Signed by Andre L'Heureux, Executive Secretary of Nfcus, the release said eight fourth-year undergraduate applications for bursaries have been rejected at Waterloo College. Many students who previously received bursaries cannot consider the possibility of incurring a debt of perhaps $1,500 to complete their studies, the release continued.

A letter requesting information has been sent to the Hon. W. J. Dunlop and to student council presidents and Nfcus chairmen in Ontario universities, the release concluded.

At the university of Toronto, 608 applications have been made for type B Dominion-Provincial bursaries and 493 have been awarded, the registrar's office revealed yesterday.

Bissell Will Tour West To Visit U of T Alumni

Former U of T students in the western provinces will meet the president of their alma mater next week.

Dr. Claude T. Bissell left early this morning to visit 9,000 Alumni Association members in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

The trip is mainly a get-acquainted tour consisting of luncheons, dinners and receptions. The alumni in each city are arranging the program.

Dr. Bissell's main address will be to the Canadian Club of Regina on Jan. 14. He is expected to summarize his trip at Victoria on Jan. 20 or 21.

Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver and Victoria will be Dr. Bissell's stops in Canada. From Victoria, he will go to San Francisco and Los Angeles to visit alumni groups there.

Talks To Explore Europe

Europe comes to the campus today with Dean Ian Macdonald's lecture on travel in Europe in room 13, University College.

The talk will be the introduction to a "Destination: Europe" series sponsored by World University Service.

The series is intended as an aid for prospective travellers in Europe, and a source of information for those interested in the subject.

Dean Macdonald will discuss the purpose of a trip to Europe. Other speakers will later talk on specific countries and specific problems involved in a European tour.

The talks are "invaluable for those planning trips next year, because these people have all been to Europe recently and can give up-to-date information," series chairman Adrienne Allen said last night.

"It's necessary to have a foundation before going to Europe", she said. The talks are designed to give "a familiarity with the unfamiliar."

Other lectures will all be in room 33, UC. They are: Julian Porter (IV Meds) on Italy Jan. 21; George Wilson (III Trin) and Willson McTavish (II Trin) on the British Isles Jan. 28; Howie Rubinfeld (IV Meds) on Scandinavia Feb. 4; George Butterfield (II Trin), Sydney Robinson (II Trin) on transportation Feb. 11; Dunc Edmonds (IV Vic) on France Feb. 18.

Firemen Here Twice In Week

City fire trucks have roared onto the campus twice in the last two days—and both times found no fire.

Two hose trucks and an aerial ladder appeared in front of St. Mike's Elmsley Hall at 8 a.m. yesterday. Inspectors labelled the incident "smoke mistaken" after a search party found no evidence of smoke reported by a witness.

Quick thinking on the part of three Victoria College residents Sunday saved a car from serious damage before fire trucks arrived.

Freshmen Bill Musgrove, Perry Anglin and Craig Peters grabbed a fire extinguisher and rushed out of residence after a scream from the street attracted their attention.

A driver, Miss Janet Carnegie, a non-student, had been attempting to start her car in front of Burwash Hall on Queen's Park when fire broke out in the engine.

The Vic residents put off the blaze with the fire extinguisher and snow. Fire trucks later arrived to clean gasoline off the street.

Cause of the fire is believed to have been a leaking gas tank.

Government Under Attack As Parliament Under Way

By HARVEY L. SHEPHERD
Varsity News Editor

Progressive Conservative leader of the campus Model Parliament last night said PC's may launch belt-tightening legislation as soon as Canada pulls out of the present recession.

Kicking off the throne-speech debate, prime minister Jeremy Johnston said, "We can look forward to a return of full employment in the not-too-distant future."

But, he said, the program of public works must be stepped up in order to combat winter seasonal unemployment.

The recession is still with us, adequate in housing, loans, non-seasonal employment, an extended health plan and a substitution of aid for arms in foreign affairs among other things.

PC defence minister Bruce Haines scored the fact that defence is still "a Canadian approach and not a continental concept."

With regard to the Avro "Arrow" aircraft, he said the government hesitates to produce it because of the danger of production duplication with other nations.

It our share of defence production is duplicated, Haines said, Canada could be reduced to "military vassalage" to the United States.

CCF'er Alec Haverland offered a planned economy to answer the Soviet "challenge" in the realm of productivity.

He drew a distinction between "public and private property," saying lipstick is lumped together with atom bombs and hydrogen bombs in present computations of the gross national product.

Conservative Robin Beamish spoke in favor of having members of parliament elected from the nation's universities. Voting age for these ridings would be dropped to 18.

And Liberal Rick Alway called for a Canadian flag and national anthem.

Answering opposition questions, PC's informed the House that the question of university student tax exemptions is under PC consideration.

Throne Speech —

Northern Affairs Stressed

Campus Conservatives gave top priority to foreign policy and northern development in the Speech from the Throne at Model Parliament's opening last night.

Read by governor-general Joseph McCulley, Warden of Hart House, The Speech reaffirmed support of the United Nations, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Commonwealth. But the speech asked for an adjustment to "the challenges of the trade and economic offensive being waged by the communist nations among the countries of Asia and Africa", in the Speech.

The parliament's government also advocated a "re-assessment of our aims and methods" in regard to foreign policy.

Professing itself "committed to a policy of vigorous development of our natural resources," the government stressed the importance of the construction of northern roads and railways, and "hopes that agreement may soon be reached enabling development of the Columbia River".

Seasonal unemployment will be combatted by deficit budgeting and stimulation of employment opportunities, the government said.

The Speech also mentioned the three bills already placed on the agenda, by the Conservative government. Strengthening of the Trades and Union Act to combat union malpractices, reorganization of the Senate and adoption of a Bill of Rights would be advocated by the government, the Speech said.

Bleed, Sinners

People with guilty consciences are needed to help the Red Cross go into the red.

Local Red Cross officials said yesterday they are "in a hole as to present blood supply," and are relying on U of T's drive "to put us in the red again."

Charlotte Hubbell, campus campaign chairman said yesterday, "I hope all those students with guilty consciences about not donating last year will help us reach the increased quota."

Last year the drive lowered its objective because of a lack of adequate facilities, but with additional locations this year, they hope for at least 2,500 pints of blood.

The canvass this year for the precious red liquid extends from Feb. 16-20. The extra centres for donations will be added on the Thursday and Friday, when a rush of donors is expected.

"Last year everyone's conscience smote him at the end of the week, and great crowds rushed to donate," Miss Hubbell said.

The blood drive will soon be publicized in each college and faculty. Student service representatives from each school will meet Monday at 4.30 p.m. in the Students' Administrative Council office to receive schedules and campaign information.

Donors must be enrolled as such to donate blood, to give the clinic some idea of how many people to expect.

Enrolment cards will be available through student service representatives.

Ladies Pose Problem For Federal Speaker

Hon. Roland Michener, speaker of the federal House of Commons, concluded his busman's holiday with the U of T Model Parliament last night with a verbal tip of the hat to the ladies.

Summing up his Model Parliament impressions at the close of last night's sessions he said the Model Parliament would be a "credit to many members of that other house to which you have been referring."

"One improvement," he said, "is the presence of a great many more ladies."

But the ladies presented him with a new problem.

Never, he said, has a speaker of the federal House had to decide whether it is allowable for a member to knit during parliamentary sessions.

Walking out of the Ontario parliament buildings last night, his starched speaker's collar still showing beneath his overcoat, the speaker said the number of procedural questions he had to settle was "about the same" as in the federal House.

"I let some questions go through that were technically out of order," he said.

The speaker said one problem that confronted him was that while the Model Parliament does not follow federal procedure entirely in some respects, there is some disagreement on these points of difference.

But the university students are "a bit better behaved" than their federal counterparts, he said.

"They hit each other a little harder in Ottawa," he said.

Asked whether he would be able to catch his plane for Ottawa, he said, "Yes, thank you," and swept into a car.

Engineers Results: Few Flunk Out

First year engineering students have received their examination results and most of them have breathed a sigh of relief.

Of the 532 freshman, only 16 have been advised to leave the faculty, said Dean R.R. McLaughlin last night.

Dean McLaughlin added that 15 to 20 more have been warned their chances are not good and their work will have to be improved.

Two years ago students who failed to obtain a required average in the Christmas examinations were compelled to leave the faculty. Last year, for the first time, those with particularly low marks were merely advised to leave.

"This is now the policy of the faculty," said Dean McLaughlin.

Engineers who fail in their first year are not allowed to re-enter first year the following session, but must wait out for that session. Students have until mid-February to withdraw.

If they withdraw by this time they will not be deemed to have failed their year and may reapply for admission next September. The second half of their fees will be returned if they withdraw by that date.

Parliament Data . . .

The Model Parliament reconvenes tomorrow at 4.30 p.m. for its second sitting. Further debate on the Speech from the Throne has been placed on the agenda by the Conservative government.

The evening session beginning at 8 p.m. will see the introduction and debate on a government labor unions bill.

Legislative Chambers may be reached through the front doors of the provincial parliament buildings facing south on Queen's Park.

OCE Can Take More Students

— says dean

The dean of the Ontario College of Education Monday said OCE should be able to handle any enrolment increase in the college in the next few years.

Dean B. C. Diltz said he had no way of telling whether the enrolment jump in future years would parallel this year's 60 per cent increase or whether an approximate status quo would be maintained.

Figures recently released by the U of T registrar show an enrolment of 426 in the faculty this year. Last year only 273 attended OCE.

A building campaign was completed last spring, the dean said, and any shortage of teachers in the college could be made up from the University of Toronto Schools staff.

"We can take them as they come," he said.

"The future in the teaching profession," he added, "has never been as bright as it is today — both at the secondary school and university levels."

The college has plans which could be put into effect whether enrolment jumps or stays stationary, he said.

As possible reasons for the enrolment jump, the dean cited better working conditions, better salaries and a greater challenge in the field of teaching.

He also said the present decrease in jobs offering salaries comparable to those to be obtained in teaching could be a factor.

Photographers!

The editor, filled with spirit of love and loyalty and weeping bitter tears of forgiveness, commands all photographers who have worked on The Varsity at any time, plus all students who have ever felt faint inclinations to see their photographs badly reproduced on these pages, to join him for tea today at 4 p.m. in the KCR. So great is the feeling of love, loyalty and forgiveness, the editor will pawn his watch and buy one free round.

—whatever type of interceptor Canada decides to use, "Canadian men and materials will be on hand to produce them;"

—On Nov. 30 there were 361,000 Canadian men and women seeking jobs;

—the U of T Model Parliament has already recognized Communist China—but hasn't gotten China to recognize Canada.

Liberal Pierre Leduc introduced a private member's bill calling for an Atlantic economic community including Canada, the United States, the British West Indies, the European Common Market and those countries now discussing the idea of a European Free Trade Area.

A CCF amendment calling for a commission to study the question of liberalized trade with the world, including the Soviet bloc and Communist China, was voted down.

The time limit prevented the original bill from being brought to a vote.

Among other events of the session:

PC Del O'Brien asked if he could supplement an answer to a question. Speaker Roland Michener suggested O'Brien try and see if Mr. Michener stopped him. O'Brien did. Mr. Michener did.

A pretty Liberal brunette asked how the Conservatives planned to double Canada's population while restricting immigration—and received a great deal of PC applause.

A PC question asking whether the expected population increase was connected with Liberal Carol Mahood's knitting also was well applauded.

Reaction: Fraternities Rise To Own Defence

By JACK SEEDHOUSE
Varsity Staff Reporter

Several men's fraternities at the University of Toronto last night supported the decision of the Caput in the action it took regarding five members of Delta Tau Delta and a graduate member of Zeta Psi.

The fraternities contacted, however, were unanimous in saying the men involved were not representative of their own fraternity or representative of fraternity men in general.

"If the students involved had all been members of a particular church, would this mean the whole faith should be condemned?" asked Dunc Edmunds, president of Delta Kappa Epsilon.

A few fraternities felt the action was a little strong, but general feeling was some action had to be taken even if these students had to be examples. "The incidence of pranks is far too great on this campus," said one fraternity president. "They are becoming too serious to be ignored."

A spokesman for Caput said last night the committee formed to investigate fraternities and their relations to the University is not what students have assumed it to be.

"We do not even know what we are looking for," the Caput spokesman said, "but we definitely do not feel fraternities are a problem."

The committee may ask to speak with fraternity officers and members and through discussion arrive, perhaps at some constructive suggestions. The members of the committee may ask permission to visit some of the houses.

The entire idea is to try and arrive, through discussion, at something constructive, the spokesman said. The purpose of the "investigation", as it has been called, is definitely not to condemn, he said.

When informed of this statement, fraternity spokesmen were in almost unanimous support. Sigma Chi president Bob McLennan said, "discussion between Caput members and fraternity men might be very good and possibly constructive. We do not feel it should be legislative in any way, but we would certainly be glad to co-operate at Sigma Chi."

"Caput discussion might be very good for fraternities," said Phi Kappa Sigma president

Introduction See West Indies

U of T students will get a glimpse of life in the Commonwealth's newest member country tomorrow night.

Films, talks and informal discussion form the agenda of a "West Indies Night" sponsored jointly by World University Service and the External Affairs Commission at 8.30 p.m. Thursday in Falconer Hall.

The evening is planned as a source of background and information for students interested in the West Indies or planning to attend a WUS seminar there next summer.

Trinity's dean E. J. Earp will open the evening with a short talk on the set-up of the summer seminar. A member of the West Indies Travel Board will show films and talk on West Indian folklore. A West Indian calypso group will play during the meeting.

Informal discussion with West Indian students will take up the rest of the meeting. Refreshments will be served.

The evening will be preceded by an EAC meeting at 7.30 p.m.

Travellers Advised To Have Corkscrew Handy

A U of T professor told students yesterday one of their most important assets on a trip to Europe would be a cork screw.

Ian Macdonald, University College dean of men, said sampling the food and especially the wine of different European countries is one of the best ways of learning about the "soul of the people of the nation."

His lecture was the first in the World University Service series "Destination: Europe" on travel to Europe.

Dean Macdonald recommended students see the sights of the continent via a London taxi cab. He said he brought an old discarded taxi for $50 a few years ago and put half-a-million miles on it in his travels.

For students who want to hitch-hike from country to country, a pack sack and a Canadian flag are the passports to a sure ride. "Canadians are ranked by the Europeans themselves as the most welcome and acceptable of travellers in Europe," Dean Macdonald said.

He warned students to trust no one on their travels. Europe is "full of parasites" who are always on the lookout to take advantage of more gullible tourists, he said.

Condemning the frantic preparation most people associate with the planning of a trip, Dean Macdonald said less preparation involved with a trip means a more spontaneous, fun-packed and enjoyable holiday.

Other "Destination: Europe" lectures will be: Julian Porter (IV Meds) on Italy Jan. 21; George Wilson (III Trin) on the British Isles Jan. 28; Howie Rubinoff (IV Meds) on Scandinavia Feb. 4.

All lectures begin at 1 p.m. in room 33, UC on the designated day.

public appeal

Toronto's afternoon newspapers are waging a splashy war against corporal punishment in Canadian prisons and penal institutions. The first shot was fired some months ago when a well-known columnist told the story of an 18-year-old youth who hanged himself rather than receive a second dose of a brutal and sadistic punishment known as "the strap". The column was vivid without being sensational. It sickened the mind rather than the stomach.

This week the other afternoon paper began a series dealing with the same problem. The first article in the series has much the same impact, although less subtly stated, as did the columnist's story. It also contained figures and statistics revealing Canada, particularly Ontario, as one of the most barbaric nations in this regard in the world.

Judging by the facts and cases presented by the newspapers, this barbarism will soon be stopped. Canada has always lagged behind her western colleagues in penal reform, but her citizens will not long tolerate a form of brutality abolished by Britain more than ten years ago and currently outlawed in all but one of the 49 states.

In presenting this problem to the public and dragging the sadism into the open the newspapers have contributed immeasurably to its reform. No doubt they will take due credit for it.

Fortunately only a few university students, professors and philosophers in general will be aware of the hypocrisy underlying the newspapers' motives.

Our Readers Write: SMC Not Alone

Dear Sir,

Your article on apathy among the Saint Michael's students deals with a grave problem, and therefore cannot be considered lightly. One thing is clear, however, St. Mike's is not the only place on campus where infective apathy is eating at the foundations of such worthy organizations as the Music Guild and the Gryphon. It seems obvious from the serious financial failure of Trinity's The Cave Dwellers, AVR casting problems, and even the difficulties of the Varsity in finding reporters, that the attitude of indifference is widespread on this campus. This is inevitable, since the U. of T. resembles a city made up of people from many different backgrounds, who are now engaged in studying a wide variety of subjects. When this melting pot is split up into four colleges and numerous faculties, there are bound to be only a few enthusiastic people in each activity. We all have a great deal of work to do, and cannot possibly support all local groups. There is no apathy involved in being a good student, and therefore having no time for a number of extracurricular activities.

The crime of apathy sets in when a few enthusiastic people are hampered and criticised by people who are not interested in that particular group or possibly in any group. This is not an active kind of interference but a complete lack of it, a total dismissal because a given magazine or play doesn't have enough popular appeal. Before the products of any organization can be criticised intelligently, one must come to its meetings, contribute, or if this is impossible, talk to those who do.

As the possible solution for the problem of too many groups and too few people, the colleges should come together for more activities, hold common creative writing group meetings, merge the various French Clubs, German Clubs, etc. In this way, a corporate, constructive spirit might be achieved. Certainly in this university, where men and women will probably never be more enthusiastic than they are now, there ought to be a chance for each person to be active in organizations of his own choice. If these organizations continue to be confined to the colleges, there may be more and more cases of them dying out though a few students try to keep them alive.

Old As The Sea

We met a man we knew last night and since it was Tuesday night the man was all dressed up in the uniform of an officer of the Royal Canadian Navy, Reserve Corps.

As we met the man we had just finished dinner and, as is the custom of our society, had turned our minds to the discussion of important topics of the day. Thoughts of moon rockets filled our mind, thoughts of atomic bombs, vast modern armies, civil defence and the future of mankind.

So as we met the man we thought, "Ah! Here is the stuff of which our nation is made. Here is the audacity of Drake, the courage of Nelson, the spirit of Jutland and the tenacity of the Battle of the Atlantic. Here is the power that, when the time comes, will mobilize our emotions, lead us out of the foul complacency into which we have fallen and, prepared and ready, will someday do its duty.

Our heart warmed to this man in whom we placed our trust and the navy in which he served. With new hope rising in our breast we asked him what sort of training the UNTD would conduct that night.

The pipe shifted in his clenched teeth, his solid jaw dropped into a tight, British smile and with clipped, commanding tone he told us:

"The chaps are going to do a bit of sword drill tonight"

Young Toronto Painter

RICHARD GORMAN AT THE GREENWICH. Generally speaking it is fair to expect an artist to start or fall as a result of his critical show. But it would be unfair to judge Richard Gorman, (showing at the Greenwich Gallery until Jan. 25th), by this standard. Perhaps it is unfortunate that he has been given a one-man show at this stage of his development. In the large number of canvases that he has produced in this short time, his best work shows promise, but the overall quality is uneven.

A young man who has spent all of his 22 years in or around Toronto (Ontario College of Art), Gorman has produced work which is characterized by strong rich colour, and simple compositional form. Such limited background may have some advantages: it gives confidence and purity to paintings; on the other hand, it can lead to sterility. There were bound to be many empty canvases. Typical of these are '100 Bloor St. West' — a miscellaneous collection of streamers of colour, and 'Mirage No. 1' — which borders on sentimentality in its obviousness.

A canvas filled with rich colour may be sensually pleasing, but this does not make it a good work of art. For example, every good painting contains devices which hold the eye. An accomplished painter does this by a composition, in which the movement keeps bringing the eye back into the painting. A less skillful method of achieving this end is by making one end of the canvas heavier than the other; this gives the impression that the subject may tip over at any minute, and the eye is held by this feeling of suspense. In half of his paintings, this is consistently the method used by Gorman.

'Disturbed Lake' is a fine painting: a whirlpool of mystic beauty and mysterious shape. It is predominantly a fiery green colouristically, and the artist seems under the influence of MacDonald's latest period.

The most ambitious and perhaps the only intellectual canvas is 'Portrait of the Artist' — an attempt with a limited palette to tie to a skeleton of strong basic construction, an 'elan' of imagination and whirling cosmic flesh. This purpose is developed not only in line and colour, but in a deliberate variation of texture, where we find the contrast of undulating impasto with the bare canvas itself. In this attempt, the artist's success is impressive.

But if only because conservative Torontonians have been spoiled through the years of allowing themselves to be exposed only to the work of accomplished and acclaimed practitioners in the arts, it is refreshing and stimulating to have the opportunity to see how promising young painters develop. The Greenwich Gallery should be congratulated for presenting such an exhibition. Richard Gorman's work is worth seeing. Bob Kaplan

PERSON ON JAZZ

We're back again with a series of record-reviews, opinionated comment, and general jazz columnistics. Watch out, Jonah Jones will be put down, the blues extolled, and we'll gas about some recent releases.

Neil Hefti and his orchestra: PARDON MY DOO-WAH (Epic LN 3481) is a brightly-swinging-happily listenable collection. If you are familiar with Ray Conniff's wordless chorus effects, and have enjoyed Jon Hendrick's lyrics of the Basie book (Sing A Song of Basie, ABC Paramount), then you need only one more ingredient to describe Doo-Wah: Neil Hefti. He is an excellent composer-arranger-band-leader, who's written much original music for big bands (Herman, Basie, Hefti) and recently a Count Basie album. (E=mc2, Roulette) stayed on the top ten jazz Lp list because of Hefti's arrangements.

The contents of this album are more varied than any of the above mentioned, both in delivery and substance. The mood changes from a blowing "Ready Ruby" to cute-commercial "buttercup" to a bluesy "After Supper" to a very Hefty "Coral Reef". The last two tracks on that same side, "Slanky" and "Cool Blue" could come respectively from Conniff (except the pure jazz solo) and Sing A Song of Basie.

A very important factor in the album's success is the high calibre of musicians employed on the date. In particular you should dig Phil Woods on "Kiss Me First" and "Chug-a-lug".

WARM WOODS (Epic LN 3136) is one of my favorite albums of the past year. Phil Woods, a young alto-man from New York, displays a technical fluency of expression on par with Konitz, a series of blues influences from Parker to Rollins, a pretty sound a la Desmond, and in addition a strong sense of individuality. Unlike many lesser horn-men he has a continuity of original ideas, avoiding repetitious clichés.

J.J. IN PERSON! (Columbia CL 1161) features the newly-formed J. J. Johnson quintet with Nat Adderly on cornet. Undoubtedly J. J. is the greatest modern jazz trombonist as witnessed by his past albums and personal appearances. His sound has none of Brookmeyer's harshness and a generally looser, buoyant rhythm distinguishes him from his former partner, Kai Winding.

This record opens with a weird chord Monk composition, "Mysterioso", subtly restrained at first, then staccato wailing by Nat, succeeded by J.J.'s craftsmanlike solo. This bit of well-done modernism is followed by a balanced selection in which "Now's the Time" and "Walkin'" come out extremely well.

Although the quality of the musicianship is exceedingly high throughout the entire record, there are a few minor drawbacks — too many of J.J.'s tonal-doodles sound repetitious and the cornet-trombone-plus-rhythm instrumentation is also lacking in color range — but if you want the best in modern trombone rhythm, don't hesitate.

MILESTONES (Columbia CL 1193) is a truly exciting jazz record. Throw away Jonah Jones, close your eyes and dig, man, dig. Perhaps you should work up to this gem in stages. If Jonah is your present idea of jazz, take a post-graduate course with Bobby Hackett, then Roy Eldridge (Louis Armstrong and Dizzy Gillespie can be left as options) and you'll soon be digging deeper than the mere sweet embellishment of a pop tune.

As in their previous albums, there is a strong compelling strength in the music. The individuals in the group are working with a strong sense of respect for the total effect; for example, Miles blows a restrained, sparsely elaborated trumpet, always following the theme which Coltrane in turn explores with the same sensitivity and regard for the melody. Bird-like Julian Adderly is new to the group on this record, but adds another thousand voices inside the unity of the arrangements.

The past year has been the year of Monk, Rollins and Miles. Public acceptance of bebop finally came, 15 years later. A reaction against pretty pussy-footing and West-Coast chamber-pot neo-classicism has resolved itself in the present reaction. Funky, post-bop, East Coast, rock-bop, call it what you will, has been hailed by the snobs, hip prophets and the quick-to-see-new trends critics as the beat for '58. If you care to be IN, you can even listen to the rhythm and blues and the noisier folk-singers. If you care to see the above-mentioned hippies, you should join us at the next regular meeting: the Josh White concert in Eaton Auditorium this Wednesday at 8.30. Which way will the wind blow in '59?

Run Fun Well Done

SOME CAME RUNNING (Loews) is one of the funniest, yet, at times, strangely moving melodramas to hit the screen this season.

Adapted from James Jones' ("From Here To Eternity") mammoth hymn to promiscuity, the film has been given the Sunday School retouch, but still offers a stupendous avalanche of American clichés. Most of the picture's defects are, in fact, inherited directly from the author, but it is a tribute to first-rate Director Vincente Minnelli that he has taken a literary flop and made it a celluloid success.

Less than fresh from the army and a discharge spree in the windy city, boozy young novelist (Frank Sinatra) wakes up on a bus with a prepaid ticket to his small midwest hometown. With him is his baggage (Shirley Maclaine), thoughtfully provided by drinking cronies of the previous evening.

In short order, he has snafued the social rating of his married-into-the-business brother (Arthur Kennedy) and tossed a long pass at a well-shaped pillar of the local college faculty (Martha Hyer), who admires him for his "exciting talent" — literary that is. When the trig prig offers a cold shoulder, Frankie boy teams up with a likable card shark (Dean Martin), who drinks like a French drain and bumblefoots around the local brassiere factory talent. The film ultimately explodes into a chase climax that is exciting, moving and equally satisfying on both counts.

In this top-notch production, Director Minnelli can lay out an extraordinary hand because he holds most of the good cards — sharp insights, a master's touch at bringing out character, fundamental sympathy, a provocative use of authentic locales and a painter's palette of colour. The situations are timeworn, but Minnelli manages to make them seem fresh, and his superb cast act out hand-me-down situations with directness and intensity. Frank Sinatra at the picture's heel that ever walked over himself and left flat is a first. It was a wonderful time playing himself, but then he plays the part with complete conviction and transcending vulgarity. Shirley Maclaine plays his dumb floozy companion to hip-licking, face-painted perfection in a performance richly deserving an Academy Award.

Essentially, the film offers no new wrinkles to the lowlife in high life; but it does provide outstanding cinema entertainment. Ted Schaefer

UofT Professor Deplores Lack Of Mathematicians

Professor Norris E. Sheppard, of the Dept. of Mathematics at the University of Toronto, says there is an acute shortage of mathematicians in every sphere.

In a career article published under the sponsorship of the New York Life Insurance Company, Professor Sheppard stated that in industry, universities, insurance firms and the government, job opportunities are plentiful.

Fewer than one person in every 7,000 can live as professional mathematicians in Canada and the U.S. Yet governments could not function without statisticians; insurance companies need actuaries to guide them; science depends heavily on pure mathematics, he said.

An easy contest sponsored by New York Life showed that although 19 percent of the entrants lay in the field of science and engineering, including mathematics, few wanted to become professional mathematicians.

"Far from being a dead science," said professor Sheppard, "mathematics is living and vital." He considers it one of the noblest sciences.

"It is a science which trains a man to cope with unknown quantities and to translate their relationships into logical, comprehensible patterns."

He also feels that a child should study as much mathematics as he can, for no matter what career he chooses, the training in logical thinking which mathematics gives will be invaluable in later life.

Some Hope For Man

Unpaid Christmas bills have not yet made everybody desperate for funds.

Last week, Mrs. L. Shepherd, a nursing graduate, lost several folded bills in the Medical Building.

"I never really expected to see the money again," she said yesterday.

This week it was announced a sum of money had been found there, and Mrs. Shepherd claimed it.

She does not know who turned in the money, but she sincerely thanks them.

"It sort of makes you believe in the goodness of man again," she said.

ALL-DAY MILDNESS

Black Cat PLAIN CORK FILTER

By LIZ BNKS

In view of Thursday's big West Indian night which World University Service is sponsoring for those interested in this year's summer seminar, I found myself doing some fact-finding at the WUSC headquarters on Wilcox St.

Pat Robinson, assistant secretary, had, among other things, some especially interesting information on Canada Council scholarships for students both here and abroad.

With $50,000,000 nest egg to indulge in education grants, the Council has provided 38 Canadian scholars with the financial means to study abroad during the past 18 months.

A study program for foreign students in Canada was outlined in 1957, and this year, in 10 universities across the country, the National Museum in Ottawa and CBC in Toronto, the first influx of Canada Council scholars is settling in.

They can be found at McGill, Laval, UBC, Western, Montreal, Ottawa, Carleton, Memorial, St. Francis Xavier, and Toronto.

There are 48 of them, representing 36 countries. They come from Egypt, Korea, Pakistan, Spain, USA, the West Indies, Cuba, Peru, Yugoslavia, India, Japan, New Zealand, Poland, France, England and Germany — to name a few.

In Toronto, 19 scholars, — 12 men, five women and one married couple — are engaged in study ranging from English, Economics, Music and Philosophy, to Criminology and Geography.

Among the more distinguished scholars at Toronto is Victor S. Reid, author of The Leopard for Viking Press and Macmillan of Canada, and an authority on the West Indies Mr. Reid, a native of Jamaica, is a former newspaperman and is here for a year to write and see the country.

The scholarships, of one-year duration, are divided into two classes, "A" class, for senior fellows "of great distinction" offers $5,000 plus travel allowances and 2/3 travel allowances for wives plus opportunity for teaching.

"B" class offers $2,000 plus travel allowances. Both are renewable on application to scholars of great promise.

That means that the Canada Council is expending roughly $100,000 plus travel allowances on foreign students alone this year — a sizeable hunk in anyone's estimation.

Because of residence over-crowding most of the Toronto scholars are living in rooming houses.

As Pat put it: "They like the Canadian students they've met, but so far have met very few. They're all genuinely interested in Canada and Canadian students especially. A lot of them belong to FROS, but of course go there mainly to meet other foreign students. Few Canadians go to the functions".

This Thursday at 8:30 P.M. in Falconer Hall, Canadians will have a chance to meet the scholars. WUSC is holding a full-scale West Indian night to arouse interest in, and explain some facts about, the seminar planned there this summer.

The Canada Council students are among those invited. They're well worth meeting — and the evening might end in a summer abroad.

Wayne Hayworth. "It might help the fraternities a great deal in some instances."

Bill Palm, president of Beta Theta Pi, agreed that Caput discussion might be good for the fraternities. "Definitely, relations can be improved," he said. Palm also advocated inter-fraternity discussion.

most of the fraternities contacted. They were unanimous in condemning a governing body, such as the Inter-fraternity Council which governs the women's fraternities on campus to some extent.

"Nor do we agree with having any University control of fraternities," said one president. "That is the situation in the

Pat Wood Is Net Winner

By PAM HILL

Pat Wood of P&OT won the Interfaculty badminton tournament yesterday by defeating Dorothy Vernon (III Trinity) by a score of 11-6 and 11-4.

The Carleton Club played host to the 16 finalists, and in the end, Pat Wood, Dorothy Vernon, Jill Secord (Victoria) and Sue Hamilton (Trinity) came out on top. Not beyond mention is the game that Barb Goodwin (Trinity) gave Pat, probably the toughest competition Pat had. The score was 11-8 and 11-9, so ... if Barb were to challenge ...

It is usually supposed that the four winners make up the Intercollegiate team. However, only the top two are 'definites', and the other two may be challenged by anybody on campus until this Saturday noon.

The "farmers" (you called it, Sharon!) played hockey at 8:00 a.m. Monday against Meds ... Most of the play took place in Pharmacy's end, and, although their defense was good and the net was tended beautifully (by none other than Sharon Milgram), the Doctors defeated them, 2-0. Ruth Groh and Levina Lickley scored. All in all, it was a good debut for the farmers (or is it "pharmers"?), particularly against the third league's top-seeded team.

Later that day, St. Hilda's managed to get a 3-0 win over U.C. (first league). Jeanette McKay, Laurel Ball and Sue Hamilton netted one apiece, and Baby Blues ice squad overcame Osgoode Hall 7-2 in hockey action at Varsity Arena last night. It was the second straight win for the Intermediates in their, as yet, young season.

Varsity hit the score column early in the first period with Gerry Manale's partly screened drive from the blueline. Terry Wensley received an assist on the play.

Baby Blues tied it up as Pete Warren stickhandled past his own goalie to make it 1-1. Osgoode's John Hamilton got credit for the goal.

Varsity made no mistake on two late-period tallies. Bill Griffin finished off a sustained drive tipping in a pass from Pete Randle at 16:03. Two minutes later Gord Frey set up Gord Gow in the clear to give Varsity a 3-1 lead at the end of the first period.

Randle took a pass from Griffin at 9:55 of the second stanza to put Varsity further in the lead.

Osgoode's final tally came at 16:42 when Ross Woods slammed the puck past Varsity's Bob Hollyman after a scramble in front of the net.

Hamilton, who had "scored" without putting the puck in the net himself, finally got one — into his own cage. He pushed the puck behind netminder John Goodwin while trying to clear it.

Gow was given credit for the tally as the last Varsity player to touch the puck before Hamilton performed his evil deed.

Leading 5-2 at the end of the second, Baby Blues scored two unanswered goals in the final period to put the game on ice.

Griffin made it 6-2 on a 20-foot screen shot that Goodwin didn't see until he noticed the disc nestling in the webbing behind him.

Gow finished off his hat-trick, stealing the puck at the blueline and skating in alone on Good-

Mary Munro lifted a lovely little puck into a right corner — just after the bell went!

Then yesterday, PHE defeated Nursing, 4-2. Lee Picherall scored two for PHE, and the others were all singletons: Mary Russel and Judy Kelding for PHE, and Jay Kelding and Bernice Wiley for the Irish.

... and in this corner by pam hill

With hockey and volleyball under way, badminton and archery tournaments in action, and basketball teams being chosen, there's lots to prattle on about — number one being the most controversial girl's sport — hockey.

It looked rather 'touching' the other day when a poor wee bit tumbled off the ice with blood trickling from the middle of her forehead to her mouth. Nothing a few stitches couldn't fix — and it was just a bit of unintentional high-sticking, but ... no penalty.

First league hockey is definitely of a higher calibre each year, and it's about time the referees started to realize it. Rules should be enforced, and penalties handed out for things like tripping, high-sticking, body-checking (illegal in girl's hockey) and holding.

But, then what would the Health Service do with all their money?

Also, some of the larger colleges, like UC, Victoria and Trinity have two women's teams playing, usually one in the first League, and one in the third. Now there's a rule in the girl's hockey sheet that says: "no A player can play any B games after the schedule has started". It has been noted that, whether intentionally or not, one of the teams played their first game, a B game, with a team made up of half their A players.

No wonder they swamped the opposition! But, the coach can rightfully maintain that they were keeping within the rules, and Jack Kennedy would leap at such an opportunity, but ... this is only girl's hockey, and it's only the first of the season — You probably had the winning team anyway!

At a swimming meeting the other day, it was announced that U. of T. placed fourth in the invitational telegraphic meet sponsored by UBC. Vancouver's Irene Service (one-time Canadian champion) probably played a large part in that University's win (oh that Sara Barber would come to U. of T.).

Our fourth place is attributed mostly to Val Lewis, who got a first in the 100 yards freestyle (1:12.5) and a second in the 50 yards freestyle (30.8). Also, the club apathetically proposed another small, dual meet, possibly with OAC or BSS (groan), but, what will come of it, qui sait?

Well, here's our first column. Cheers!

win. He diked the Osgoode netminder and slid the puck past him as he dived in the wrong direction.

Temper flared in the late minutes of the game, and referees Bill Naylor and Bob Nadin were kept hopping quelling two outbreaks that brought forth some hefty swinging.

George Whyte and John Gattion were heaved out of the game after a fistcuff display with less than three minutes left. Gattion won a split decision over the ex-Blue.

Doug Loughheed and Doug Crane talked their way into a second pushing duel before players of both sides skates in to put a stop to the battle.

All told, Osgoode took 29 of the 42 minutes in penalties assessed during the bruising contest.

Boxers Give Exhibition

by MIKE CHYKALIUK

The U of T boxers kickoff the local fight season this Saturday at Hart House gymnasium with an exhibition interfaculty tournament.

Manager Ken Bond, collegiate version of Jack Kearns, and coach Tony Canzano disclosed that the fighters are primarily novices and will be out to test their recently acquired skills.

As some of these novices will be competing in the ring for the first time, the entertainment should prove to be very hilarious. Nine bouts are scheduled.

The Blues boxing team, as yet, has not been picked. Many of Saturday's scrappers will be in line for team positions. The boxers have been practising since November, so there shouldn't be any problems in lasting three rounds.

The officiating will be handled by members of the Toronto Boxing commission.

The starting bell at upper gymnasium will ring at 8:00 P.M. So be at ringside and enjoy the fun.

Here, again, is one of those literary efforts which is not interesting, amusing or educational, but which is necessary once in awhile as we try to maintain a fairly rational plane in this topsy-turvy athletic jungle.

After all, there is a limit to adjectives and adverbs available to describe Mike Elik dancing in a jagged, hopscolchy line down the ice, or Peter Potter plumping bouncy basketballs through the silver webbing with exacting accuracy.

Or Bill Yorzyk knifing through the angry green waters like a 360-horsepower limousine, or Tim Reid tripping daintily down the sidelines en route to that warm, inviting patch of four-leaf clover in the end zone?

Yes, there are times, my friend, when you just plain run out of bon mots, rack your gray matter over a scotch and soda, and collapse mournfully into that channel which we will not attempt to swim without benefit of fins, grease or another belt of Johnny Walker.

And so, without further ado

If you were Jack Kennedy, and you coached the University of Toronto hockey team, would you:

- challenge for the Allan Cup?
- try to win the Queen's Cup?
- apply to represent Belgium in the Olympics?

If you were Warren Stevens, and some cheeky young undergrad had just asked you why you parked your car on the grass outside Hart House, would you:

- say it was John McCutcheon's car?
- smile innocently and say "Oh, is it?"
- glare at him and stalk into your office?

If your name were Punch Imlach, and you coached the Toronto Maple Leaf hockey team, would you:

- change your name?
- change some players?
- hire some executives?

If you heard that the University of Toronto swimming team were the best organized unit of its type in Canada, would you:

- go to watch their next meet?
- kick yourself when you didn't
- resolve to go to the next one?

If you were called by an afternoon daily for your observations on a critical news event, would you:

- care?
- cancel your subscription?
- hang up?

If you saw a traffic department truck installing a lighted, yellow sign over the pedestrian crosswalk on Hoskin Avenue, would you (after regaining consciousness):

- call the police?
- write to Nathan Phillips?
- throw a snowball at it?

If you were the Prime Minister of Canada, and arrived 15 minutes before schedule for a dinner, would you:

- walk into a light standard?
- go away again for 15 minutes?
- play gin rummy with the taxi driver?

If you were Fidel Castro, and you met Varsity news editor Harvey Shepherd on the street, would you:

- kiss him?
- shoot him?
- set fire to his beard?

If Boston Bruins were still in the National Hockey League, do you think they would be:

- in first place?
- in second place?
- embarrassed?

If you walked into your living room and saw a negligee thrown carelessly over Brigitte Bardot, would you:

- offer her a cup of tea?
- turn on Fighting Words on TV?
- go and look for your wife?

If you met a girl in the hall one morning and discovered she was wearing your fraternity pin, would you:

- take it back?
- ask her how she got home the night before?
- transfer into obstetrics?

If the CBC played O Canada at sign-off, would you:

- write to the Queen?
- sing?
- let the cat out?

If there were a raffle for 19 bottles of liquor and one plaid sports shirt, and you won the shirt, would you:

- say you needed it anyway?
- try to trade with your neighbour?
- insist on putting it on immediately?

If you were the Sports Editor of The Varsity, would you:

- see a psychiatrist?
- enroll at McGill?
- elope?

ISC Suspends Two Players

The Athletic Directorate last night gave unanimous approval to two suspensions handed out by the Intramural Sports Committee Monday for separate incidents in intramural games played during December.

One player was suspended for two games, effective immediately, after referee-in-chief Don Borthwick submitted a report indicating the player involved had used abusive language in questioning an incident on the ice.

Borthwick assessed the player a 10-minute misconduct and a match penalty. The incident occurred in the final minute of play in the game.

The second suspension saw the ISC order a player in a lower group to refrain from all intramural hockey competition for the duration of the current season.

The player had, according to the senior referee in charge of the game, swung his stick and hit an opposing player in the face, inflicting a visible wound.

The player was given a major penalty for deliberate attempt to injure, and a match penalty when he persisted in attacking the injured player.

The two suspensions were meted out by the ISC, and then reported to the Directorate for consideration. The latter board supported the ISC move.

Identification of the players involved was not disclosed.

John McCutcheon, assistant director of athletics in charge of the intramural program, said he felt the suspensions would act as deterrents to similar incidents in the future.

The Royal Canadian Dental Corps will subsidize dental students to their dental degrees under two different, highly attractive plans leading to assured professional dental careers.

REGULAR OFFICER TRAINING PLAN

This plan offers a full four year dental course to eligible university students prepared to enrol as officer cadets. All tuition costs are paid, and cadets receive $65 per month living allowance, $63 per month salary throughout the year, free medical and dental care, allowances for books and instruments and 30 days' paid holiday each year. Cadets are enrolled as career officers, however, provision is made for voluntary withdrawal on completion of three years full duty as a commissioned officer.

21 MONTH SUBSIDIZATION PLAN

For dental students in their last two years of dental training, the Royal Canadian Dental Corps offers the 21 Month Subsidization Plan. Under this plan acceptable students are enrolled as 2nd Lieutenants, receive free tuition and are paid $210 per month plus additional marriage and subsistence allowances if applicable. Students subsidized under this plan may serve on a career basis or may return to civilian life after a minimum of five years service after completion of their academic course.

These plans offer the young man of today a career with a future both as a dentist and an officer. For full details, write for our pamphlet "An Assured Professional Career as a Royal Canadian Dental Corps Officer".

McGill Awarded Soldier's Estate

MONTREAL—CUP—McGill University was recently presented with the 2,000 acre estate of the late Brigadier A. Hamilton Gault, the founder of the "Princess Pats."

The gift consists of a large country home and unspoiled property near the village of Mont St. Hilaire. It is to be known as "The Hamilton Gault Donation in Memory of His Father, a former Governor of McGill."

Principal James of McGill announced the donation had been discussed at length, and the deed of donation was drawn up some time before the death of Brigadier Gault.

In an earlier letter he had written, "The Mountain of St. Hilaire is my most treasured possession and in offering it to McGill it is my hope its beauties and amenities may be preserved for all time to come . . . as a great heritage for the benefit and enjoyment of the youth of Canada."

"Such contacts with the peace and beauty of nature should be an influence toward the better and selfless citizenship on which the future of Canada depends," wrote Brigadier Gault.

Principal James said in accepting the estate, "Detailed plans for the use of the property are being worked out by a University committee, but every effort will be made to ensure such use does not impair the beauties of St. Hilaire."

Parliament!

Moves To Deter Union Racketing

By AL WALKER
Varsity Staff Reporter

Opposition amendments to the Progressive Conservative bill to amend the Trade Unions Act were defeated last night in the Model Parliament as almost the entire CCF party sided with the government.

The second reading of the bill was carried with no surprises, the entire government supporting it and the entire opposition opposing it.

First speaker for the government on the act, Minister of Labor Max Rotstein said the act will "assure us of no repetition of Dave Beck and James Hoffa."

The three main points of the four-page act according to Rotstein are a financial audit of union books, a secret ballot in union elections and the control of political contributions from union dues.

Jim Doris (IV SMC) agreed some control of finance was necessary, but said he believed "corporations and labor should be treated alike."

Murray Corlett, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, said the opposition amendments to the act only weakened it.

The proposed amendments contained several deletions of the government version of the act.

A CCF Private Member's Bill introduced by Larry Hebb (IV Vic.) concerned discriminatory practices under the Immigration Act of 1952.

Hebb maintained the government seeks only to attract Americans and Western Europeans, and accused the Immigration Department of misusing medical certificates and visas.

Murray Corlett attacked the bill on "legalistic grounds" and said "we will not accept any immigrants unless we can accept them as first-class Canadians."

Stewart Smith (III Vic.) backed up the CCF bill by saying "there are three Commonwealth countries which are not white... and because they are not white they are not wanted." He described the Immigration Act as "insulting to the people of Canada."

PC member David Wood (II Vic.) said "when the employment situation is alleviated we can improve our labor force with these industrious people."

The CCF bill was not voted on.

In the afternoon session two opposition amendments to the speech from the throne were defeated.

A Liberal amendment called for the establishment of "a study commission of four or five outstanding economists to completely review the basic paradox in our economy today, the unemployment and inflation problem."

Liberal back-bencher Peter Dembski, who recently defected from his position as CCF vice-

SAC Vote

May Move Date

Students' Administrative Council members were sent back to their home councils last night to sound out possibilities of advancing the date for university elections.

SAC president Vince Kelly proposed the move to eliminate "lack of cohesion" between outgoing and incoming councils, he said.

Under the scheme, new members would meet with this year's SAC to choose their portfolios March 3. Elections would be held as close to the middle of February as possible, Kelly said.

The incoming council would then have three weeks to attend committee and council meetings and learn council procedure and problems.

Chief objection to the plan was the inability of some faculties and colleges to push up election dates. If a large number of faculties or colleges were unable to advance elections, the plan would have to be scrapped, Kelly said.

If only a few members reported their home councils could not reschedule elections, candidates for the election could attend the joint meeting in March, he said.

A Threat?

An anonymous caller told The Varsity last night the Conservative government of the Model Parliament can expect to "go down to defeat at the hands of the Political Apathy League because we refuse to go on relief with Dief."

The caller said the Model Parliament means nothing, represents no-one and stands for nothing.

The absence of two government members, he said, will cause the government's fall. Two members, he added, are easy to do away with.

Study New Constitution Possibilities

The Students' Administrative Council last night set the wheels in motion to take over university student discipline.

The move came through an article in SAC's new constitution, partially discussed at last night's meeting.

The motion would reserve to Council the maintenance of "decent behavior, good conduct and proper discipline of students in any case where their conduct or behavior may involve the honor or reputation of the student body or the university."

Student discipline is at present the jurisdiction of the university Caput, the supreme university disciplinary body.

Wording of the article grew out of an SAC-Caput liaison committee formed last year to investigate the problem of student discipline. The new provision will still have to be approved by Caput if it is incorporated into the new constitution.

Caput would still reserve the right to over-rule SAC decisions under the new provision. Decisions involving expulsion or suspension of students from the university would also have to be made by Caput.

Under the new set-up, students would probably reserve the right to appeal SAC decisions to the Caput, SAC president Vince Kelly told the Council.

Incidents involving students from one college or faculty could be handled by the college or faculty disciplinary board, Kelly said.

Discussion on the article centered around the exact area of jurisdiction SAC would have over cases of student discipline. Members advocated inspection of Caput regulations regarding such jurisdiction before defining the area of SAC control.

Minutes of meetings concerning discipline of students involved in culpable incidents would be kept by the SAC Secretary-Treasurer, and would probably be made available only to the SAC president and vice-president, Kelly said.

Parliament Today

The program for this afternoon's session of the Model Parliament includes the third reading of the labor union bill, and the introduction of the Senate reform bill. A foreign policy debate will occupy the evening session.

University Grants Hiked By Quebec

QUEBEC — CUP — Quebec's premier Maurice Duplessis yesterday announced an increase in total grants to Quebec's universities, but decreased grants to Laval and McGill Universities.

These two universities each receive less during the 1959-60 fiscal year beginning April 1 than they received during the current fiscal year ending March 31 due to completion of building programs. Increased grants to the other three universities are because of new building programs.

Grants for the next year will total $11,041,700 compared with $10,328,700 currently, an increase of $713,000.

The University of Sherbrooke will receive the largest increase, $550,000, giving it a total of $1,050,000. Grants to the University of Montreal are increased by $310,000 to a total of $5,050,000. Bishop's University receives a $40,000 increase to a total of $390,000.

McGill University's grant will be decreased $62,000 to $1,739,400. Laval University's grant is cut by $125,000 to a total of $2,462,300.

Sir George Williams College receives the same amount, $360,000.

Three universities thus share an increased $900,000 in provincial grants, while McGill and Laval Universities lose $187,000.

Regina (Special) — U of T President Claude T. Bissell pointed out support of universities by Canada's newspapers as proof of increased interest in higher education in a speech here yesterday.

Calling newspapers "still the most sensitive barometer to the intellectual climate," Dr. Bissell said their support indicates a new importance attached to Canadian universities and the emergence of an intellectual class.

Speaking to Regina's Canadian Club, he said industrial support of universities is commendable, but recommended that financial aid should be given with no strings attached.

"The freer a university is of ties the better job it can do," Dr. Bissell said.

Increased student aid leaves room for bigger government grants, but Canadian universities are fortunate in being able to retain their independence by possessing many sources of aid, he said.

Dr. Bissell also warned that Russia is moving out ahead of Canada in her intellectual program.

Pointing to the study of Middle and Far Eastern languages, the President said little work has been done in Canada in the field, although Russia is pushing its development in Soviet universities.

The Regina speech was the main feature of Dr. Bissell's two-week tour of Western Canada and the United States.

Bissell: Want Aid, No Strings

puberty publicized

We have received just about enough anonymous telephone calls.

Last night we received one which consisted of a crudely-veiled threat to kidnap several members of the Model Parliament Conservative government.

Our anonymous friend saw fit to denounce Model Parliament members as a bunch of publicity-seekers with nothing better to do than listen to themselves talk.

If the stupidity of this statement is not obvious enough, it might be pointed out that The Varsity, the largest publicity organ on this campus, has never received an anonymous telephone call from a campus politician in its 78 years of existence.

If campus politicians seek publicity, at least they seek it in a reasonably honest and forthright manner.

Campus hell-raisers, and, more especially campus hell-raisers who like to take up our phone lines anonymously, put us in a very annoying position.

We feel some sort of duty to let the students know what is happening, however idiotic. To ignore every anonymous phone call would be to neglect our obligation as a news organ and perhaps to miss the biggest news story of the year.

So, we give these people the publicity they so obviously crave and students tell us, quite justifiably, that we are encouraging this sort of nonsense.

We wouldn't want to make a blanket condemnation.

Although we can sympathize with those inconvenienced by the Blinded Dog Society or certain groups of Engineers, these particular groups, at their occasional best, operate with a certain slap-dash grandeur which is, somehow, esthetically attractive.

These groups have a certain taste for adventure and sense of the fitness of things which other publicity-seeking vandals lack.

With a couple of groups, we prefer a position of neutrality, but this is not the case with those who threaten to kidnap a few students for the Nth time this year, who rip plaques off fraternity houses and who commit similar acts of vandalism.

The pettiness of this sort of action is bad enough in itself. It isn't improved by professing a sudden pious interest in preserving humility among student politicians or augmenting the funds of the United Appeal.

We don't like these people very much. When they commit these petty actions, we feel we have to publicize their ignorance but we certainly don't want to.

We wish they wouldn't bother.

And we suggest the Student Apathy League set the example by quietly appearing en masse in the spectators' gallery during tomorrow's sessions.

They might learn something.

Our Readers Write: Gryphony?

Dear Sir:

In Monday's Varsity a letter by Joan Bulger was published which defended St. Michael's College against charges of literary apathy. The author of this letter seemed to feel that SMC's now defunct magazine, The Gryphon, had failed this year because of a lack of talent and/or interest. She continued by suggesting that it would be better to forget this year's Gryphon in order to avoid publishing a poor issue.

From many viewpoints Miss Bulger's position is a faulty one. But essentially it is a misunderstanding of the function of a college literary magazine. If I can exploit an idiom, she is placing the literary cart before the publishing horse.

Miss Bulger reduces the problem to the question: Is there literature worth printing at SMC? This she answers in the negative — a dubious assumption on her part, one which should only concern a Gryphon editor. But fundamentally a magazine such as The Gryphon should exist not to "fill a real need" but to "create a need".

Student editors have the function of stimulating an interest in local literature, not just of publishing what is handed to them. They are charged with the task of commissioning new works and of offering criticism. Writers invariably cluster around such an editor, but if there is no possibility of publication, they will not devote the necessary time to their writing nor take their craft seriously. And, if there are no serious writers, there is usually a general literary apathy.

A magazine is essentially greater than a single issue of it, but if The Gryphon is not published this year, it will be even more difficult to produce one next year, with money and interest having been effectively redirected into other channels. All that I can say is this: Shame on the undergraduates of SMC for having failed to publish The Gryphon!

Wheels On A Butterfly

Last night your 'Students' Administrative Council plodded warily into consideration of a brand new constitution for itself. Sitting as a committee-of-the-whole, the SAC spent nearly an hour and a half discussing merely the first two articles of the proposed constitution. An extraordinary council meeting will be held next week to discuss the remaining articles and by-laws.

A considerable amount of time and energy has gone into preparation of the proposals considered by the council last night. While it contains many points about which we would raise objections, the proposed constitution as a whole remains a solid and intelligent piece of work, and the members of the council should respect it as such.

The dangers behind any constitutional discussion are familiar to everybody who has had anything to do with conventions or councils. Each individual usually has something intelligent to add to the discussion of each point, and the progress of the meeting is measured in terms of syllables rather than articles. This was the case last night, and the editor of The Varsity was as much or more to blame than anyone else.

Around any conference table there are conservatives and there are liberals; traditionalists and radicals, people who wish to be precise and people who prefer to generalise; people who guard against each innovation as if it were a personal attack on their souls and people who love the smell of anything new and different.

All these people are right; and unless they are allowed to express themselves, the whole constitution runs the risk of emerging as a very one-sided and unsatisfactory product. Without every point of view coming through the stale legal language needed to phrase an organization's framework, that organization would find itself in trouble in a very short time.

The trouble with all this is it takes such a hell of a long time, and nobody in our long history of constitutional development has yet managed to find any democratic way of speeding it up.

Next week SAC members will live up to the title of "self-centred student politicians". They will live up to it because they have to — but they won't like it very much. They will live up to it because somewhere in their "self-centred" souls is a sense of responsibility and obligation. They will live up to it because somehow they believe student life and student activities — possibly student discipline — will be a little better because of their efforts.

They will live up to it because nobody else around this campus gives too much of a damn who controls the things they take advantage of so frequently.

This year's council has made a few mistakes and they may even be on the point of making one more. But they will try not to, and they will try not to with a patience which makes most of their smug critics look as small and unimportant as they are.

Every now and then SAC members start asserting their collective egos and beaming forth with something called pride. When that happens, somebody can justly prick the SAC's balloon and bring them down to earth.

In the meantime we are getting pretty sick and tired of hearing smug men with smaller minds running down things they don't understand.

We suggest they roll up to Falconer Hall next Wednesday and see some of the necessary tedium which makes the world go round.

Cagers Home — Winless Face McGill Saturday

By MIKE CHYKLIUK
VARSITY STAFF REPORTER

The U of T basketball Blues returned from a not-too-glorious tour of the Southland Tuesday night. They had played eleven exhibition games against top US colleges.

Varsity lost all of these contests. Included among Toronto's opponents were Stetson, Jacksonville, and Miami. Miami is currently the highest scoring team in the US college loop with an average of 88.5 points per game. Blues bowed to them, 97-59.

Only eight Blues finished the trip. Center John Dacyshyn, guard Curt Russell and forward Bob Ecclestone did not play during the trip. Dacyshyn injured his ankle, Russell went to Baltimore, for Christmas and Ecclestone was forced to return to Toronto.

Despite all the losses Varsity did well (no pun intended). Many of the games were very close as indicated by these losing scores: Florida Southern 69-66, and Jacksonville 57-50.

With a full complement of players Toronto would probably have won half of the eleven games.

On Saturday, Varsity hosts the McGill hoopsters in the first league encounter for both clubs. Toronto won the title last year. McGill hasn't been close for years.

Western had previously held the monopoly on the crown, winning it for 15 years in a row.

Coach Metras' Marvels should again be the scourge of the league and odds on favorites to regain the mug.

With the benefit of practices, all those exhibition contests and the rest of the "jazz", Toronto should clean up on McGill this Saturday. To that effect, with fingers crossed, we will predict a Toronto victory.

Game time at Hart House gymnasium is 8 p.m.

Add To Provincial Grant Expand WUS Seminar

Application deadline for the World University Service seminar in the West Indies this summer is Jan. 20, WUS chairman Sue Evans told the Students' Administrative Council last night.

Miss Evans said students must be "mature and capable representatives of the university."

The Ontario government has granted an additional $1,000 for the seminar, she said, allowing the University of Ottawa and Waterloo College to send representatives. Total grant now is $4,500.

Application forms are available in the SAC Administrative Council office.

A talk by Trinity dean of men E. J. Earp will begin an evening of fun and information for those considering attending the seminar and others interested in the West Indies at 8.30 p.m. tonight in Falconer Hall.

Total SHARE contributions this year so far are $3,000 compared with last year's $4,500. The Ontario College of Education, however, is running its campaign today and tomorrow and SHARE officials hope the additional returns will bring this year's total closer to last year.

Two Noted Scientists At U of T This Month

The U of T will play host to two scientists this month.

Today, Dr. Frank B. Conselman, a Texas consulting geologist, will speak on "The Future of American Petroleum Geology". He is sponsored by the American Association of Petroleum Geologists.

This lecture will be at 4.15 in the Mining Building.

Another American scientist, formerly of the University of Leiden, will give the annual Glidden lecture in the Department of Chemistry.

Professor J. J. Hermans of the University of New York will speak on "Natural and Synthetic Polymers Carrying Electrical Charges".

The lecture will be given in room 1035, Wallberg Building, on Friday Jan. 23. The time is 4.15 p.m.

The Glidden lectures have been established to bring leading scientists to the University. Prof. Hermans has a world-wide reputation in the field of polymers.

Opposition Measures Blocked

Two Bills Through House

By TERRY BOURKE
Varsity Staff Reporter

Combined opposition efforts to block two Progressive Conservative vaporized into a political zero as the Model Parliament ended last night.

Despite 11th hour attempts by opposition parties to swell their ranks with late arrivals, the Tory government succeeded in pushing through bills to control narcotics and amend the Trade Unions Act.

Prime features of the labor bill are a secret ballot in union elections, control of political contributions from union dues, and "periodic" financial auditing of union books.

High point of yesterday's afternoon session in the Ontario Legislature came when Peter Dembski, a former CCFer who was sitting for the Liberals, failed to be swayed by government heckling.

Verbal fireworks were aimed at Dembski when the Government stood to vote on the labor bill. The Tories shouted at Dembski: "Stand up," and "come on over, it's about time you tried us on for size."

Dembski rose smiling to speak. His words were drowned out by a barrage of heckling and cat-calls from the Government benches.

Summing up his party's stand on the labor act earlier, CCF leader Jerry Caplan said the bill would annoy unions because every time a union member turns around "he will see a government official walking through his rooms."

He said the Tory Government was only making a pretence of standing up for the little man. "Actually," he said, "they are against labor unions and for big corporations which, in fact, have failed to behave themselves as well as unions."

Caplan blamed "violence, corruptions and deceptions played up by the American press" as one of the major factors influencing the Government in formulating its bill.

Tory Bruce Haines interrupted the proceedings when he asked if a pretty brunette back-bench Liberal was making a "red liberal flag." The girl was knitting.

Malcolm Wallace, presenting the narcotic act for the Government, called on the Opposition to support the measure "for the sake of humanity."

He urged the House not to think of the (average) addict as a "gutter tramp" and said it was the Government's aim to "hand over the control of drugs to medical authorities who are in the best position to rehabilitate the individual."

Speaking during a debate on Canadian foreign policy that occupied the evening session, Prime Minister Jeremy Johnson said the Progressive Conservatives are not prepared "to sacrifice the interests of Canadians on the high altar of the undefended border."

Blasting the CCF plank of withdrawal from NATO, Johnson said "if Canada pulls out of the NATO organization the Communists will have 'gained one of the greatest victories in the history of the Western world.'"

"Before, the Conservatives did

GOVERNMENT speaker Del O'Brien tells CCF'ers their ideas on pacifism have been wrong many times during last night's Foreign Policy debate. (VSP by Drummond) not recognize world problems," Liberal Peter Dembski told the house, "and did nothing about them. Now they recognize them and still do nothing."

"If we survive the crushing pressure of Communism it will not be by guns, but by confirmation of the democratic principle on which the western world is built," he said. Lack of government action in the "running sore areas" of Cyprus and South Africa is unexplainable, he added.

CCF'er Ken Wyman described the relations between the west and Russia as a "medieval morality play."

He said failure of North America to "get on the ball and meet the challenge of Communism face to face is due to an irrational approach to the subject on the part of the West."

Government member Del O'Brien took a swing at Socialism when he told the House social ideas of pacifism have been proven wrong many times.

Liberal Dick Hamilton warned "Canada would be submerged beneath the economic interests of the United States" if it does not take advantage of the new Atlantic European Trade community.

Speaker Case ...

Female Sergeant Ejects Disturbers

Model Parliament monotony vanished for a few wild, hilarious moments last night when Speaker Jerry Case detected a disturbance in the public gallery.

Disturbance came shortly before the session ended when some five men were seen to be throwing spit-balls into the chamber.

Operating on strict parliamentary procedure, Speaker Case called upon Sergeant-at-Arms Judy Harman to eject the scoundrels.

Placidly putting aside her knitting, Miss Harman marched up to the Mace of the House, picked it up gently and waved it in the general direction of the disturbance.

The scoundrels howled before her power and straggled out.

The scoundrels denied being members of the Political Apathy League who Wednesday threatened to kidnap two Tory members of the house.

"It was Jerry Case's idea," one said. "He sent us a note asking us to do it because the debate was so tedious."

Speaker Case denied any knowledge of such a message.

Plan U of T Entrance Survey Says Bissell

SASKATOON — (CUP) — University of Toronto president Claude Bissell, said here last night that Canadian universities will probably never establish common admission requirements.

He said the difference in provincial backgrounds accounts for this.

However, he said that "more and more Canadian universities are getting together on such questions as fees and salaries, Canadian universities have a sense of common responsibility that does not exist in the United States." He added that a comprehensive study of entrance requirements is being made at the University of Toronto and similar surveys are being made in Alberta and Nova Scotia.

A sense of intellectual adventure and the desire to press on, were cited by Dr. Bissell as the most important qualifications for a university student. These, he added, are very difficult qualities to measure by tests.

West Indian Seminar is Previewed

The External Affairs Commission took 50 students on a Caribbean cruise last night.

Purpose of the meeting was to acquaint applicants for next summer's WUS West Indian Seminar with the life and background of the Islands.

Co-sponsored here by World University Service and the External Affairs Commission, the seminar will be held in University College of the West Indies in Jamaica. Projected topic of discussion is The West Indies in Transition. The Problem of Self-government.

The meeting in Falconer Hall featured Trinity's Dean A. J.

Earp, a member of the Jamaica Tourist Board, and several West Indian students.

Dean Earp, equipped with slides taken in the Islands last summer, explained the proposed itinerary for Canadian participants and showed scenes of University College where he spent a year as lecturer.

Application forms are available in the SAC office and must be in by Jan. 20.

Canadian participants, including two students from U of T, will meet in Toronto for a three-day orientation course, then will fly to Jamaica for the three-week seminar.

Study tours of about 12 days will follow with groups of 10 going to two contrasting islands or territories.

The whole group will reassemble in Trinidad to spend a week on the campus of the Imperial College of Tropical Agriculture.

"I advise those taking part to acquire a tolerance for rum," Dean Earp said.

The program ended with a movie showing the sandy beaches and sunny skies of Jamaica against a background of calypso music.

Financial Troubles Prevent Returns

— UBC

VANCOUVER — CUP — University of British Columbia students, faced with the possibility of a $200 fee hike, have been given something else to mull over during coffee hours.

Seventy per cent of students who attended UBC last year and have not returned this year, have failed to do so for one reason—lack of money. These findings came from a private survey of Alma Mater Society president, Charles Connaghan.

The majority of students, he said, "do not appreciate the full ramifications of the fee increase."

Present basic fee for arts, science, education and agriculture faculties is $246. Fees for applied science, law, pharmacy and forestry is $296. Connaghan is planning a "grass roots" campaign in which he will try to speak personally to as many students as possible.

UBC students are prepared to make a "Third Hike" to the provincial government in Victoria in protest of the proposed hike.

AVR Gets More Changes

All-Varsity Revue rehearsals are going "very smoothly indeed" in spite of two last minute casting changes, producer Bill Lord said last night.

Female lead Pat Coulton, III Vic, and Senator Joe Starr, I Meds, were both forced to drop out of the original bookshow because of study problems, Lord said.

Third-year Trinity student Sandra Stephenson will replace Miss Coulton in "Have Toga, Will Travel", and Gerry Dawson (I Vic) will play Securus, a Roman Senator.

Lord is still active in the show despite a fractured foot received while moving a piano during rehearsals Tuesday night.

AVR creators Dick Dean and Stan Farrow have made a "great deal" of changes and cuts in the show's make-up, Lord said. "It's shaping up to be a much better show," he said.

Addition of several new songs brings the total of lyrical numbers to 16—"everything from calypso to Bach," Lord said.

Invitations to the show's black-tie opening Feb. 9 have been sent out to 300 student leaders, administration officials, patrons and critics, Lord said.

Proceeds from the sale of the remaining 200 opening night tickets will go to pay for a guest reception in the Hart House Great Hall. Opening night proceeds were not included in the show's original budget.

Lord is still looking for costume personnel to help with the show, although last week's appeal for backstage staff brought "a good turn-out".

Delegation To Attend Conference

A delegation from the U of T Psychology Club will attend as observers the annual convention of the Ontario Psychological Association in Ottawa this February, society member Lydia Senshyn said last night.

Attending the convention as delegates will be psychology professor Karl Bernhart and the Business Administration School's Dr. John Sawatsky, both of the U of T.

The convention, Feb. 5 and 7 will attract psychologists and will highlight the theme "Psychology in Action", a consideration of the emergent role of psychology today, Miss Senshyn said.

Most of the convention will take place at Carleton and Ottawa universities.

The club hopes to visit the Smiths Falls home for retarded children en route to the convention, Miss Senshyn said.

Last year the club sent about 10 delegates to the OPA convention in London, Ont., she added.

humanity outraged

We are reminded today of the utter cheapness of human life. We are reminded, too, of some other things — things we knew all along, things we tend to forget.

Fidel Castro and his noble 26th of July revolution remind us.

To a North American world the slow progress of the revolution was like a little drama set romantically in the peaceful blue of the Caribbean. To a North American world, with only its neuroses, its inhibitions and vague fears for the future to worry about, the Cuban affair was a fine chance to vicariously work off frustration.

Fidel Castro became a myth. In his mountain fastness, the bearded zealot, working with an invincible belief in the rightness of his cause, giving everything for the sake of freedom, for the love of his fellows, seemed to blend the more lovable qualities of a bandit with the heroism of an aspiring martyr.

When Castro's ardent followers swept nobly to victory, we rejoiced, although we knew it was not in any way our cause that had been won.

Then in the confusion, the picture we watched slipped slowly out of focus, revised itself, and something different emerged. It was the inevitable process of history happening almost overnight. The poles of good and evil reverse themselves, blend, and vanish altogether.

Now what? Men are shorn of dignity, grouped like digits and erased, shot dead. Hundreds have died this way, and probably thousands more will die this way. This is, it seems, the outcome of victory in a just cause.

We have seen photographs of a United States citizen stoically participating in the summary execution of a score of men. We wonder how this citizen of a nation where democracy has already been established came to take part in such a cruelty.

We have seen the face of Castro's brother, a man who has come to power to supervise the death of hundreds, and it seemed to us the face of a madman and a sadist.

No doubt the crimes of Batista, the former Cuban president and his henchmen were great. His crimes, however, are apparently now being equalled, if not surpassed.

But Castro, to retain our admiration, needed only to put on trial before the world his enemies. Instead, we are witnessing atrocities, seeing unleashed a savagery that outrages our humanity.

This story, as old in Latin America as the legend of stout Cortez, and as universal in human terms as the myth of the sack of Troy, cannot, of course, surprise us.

It can, however, revolt us. And it does. MN

A fraternity man replies

Self-Controlling Clubs

By JOHN GRAY

Former Varsity CUP editor and last year's news editor, John Gray, III UC, is an active member of Beta Theta Pi fraternity. Below he outlines the fraternities' position in relation to the university for the 12,000 odd students at U of T who are not connected with a fraternal organization.

The history of fraternities and this paper makes interesting but not very inspiring reading for members of fraternal organizations on the fringes of this campus.

It is not very inspiring because the editors of The Varsity, like nine-tenths of the rest of the campus, have little conception of what fraternities are or what they are doing.

With this lack of knowledge comes restless suspicion. Because of the fraternities' peculiar relationship with the campus there is a strong resentment by most of the University.

If it is not an editor carefully building some golden monument to ignorance and resentment, it is usually some conscience-stricken student politician who has just discovered "the greatness of our University" — and fraternities to this type represent some creeping disease seeking to destroy the whole institution.

The latest addition to this happy little group is the Caput, now taking it upon themselves to carry out an investigation to tell them what they already know or what they want to know.

That, in short, is that fraternities are creatures of the University, that they depend upon the University for their whole life and being.

The next mortifying bit of news coming out of the investigation is that the University has no control over them.

All this is true: all members of Toronto fraternities are students at the University of Toronto. Any reflection on them is a reflection on the University.

Yet fraternities are not at all part of the University in the sense of recognition. Officially the University does not even acknowledge their existence — unlike the vast majority of universities on the continent which control the fraternities.

One can easily understand the reaction of any academic faced with such a situation — "as products of the university, however indirect, they must be controlled by the university". Whether or not the fraternity system is valid seldom enters the question.

As they exist now, fraternities are self-controlling clubs. They have the right to choose their own members and the right to discipline any action contravening the rules of the fraternity.

As such they are no different from any other kind of social club, whatever may be their aims and ambitions.

If university students transgress the laws of the University of Toronto, they are punished by the Caput. This was the case with several students recently. And nobody — in fraternities or otherwise — would deny the University this right. But this is not quite right, the Caput seems to be saying. So they set out to investigate delation between fraternities and the Caput — they want to know how to discipline these creatures of the University.

If a student in any of the university residences breaks a residence rule, he is punished according to the rules of the residence. If he breaks a University rule, he is punished according to the rules laid down by the Caput, just as students belonging to fraternities were punished last week.

What the cause of complaint is may appear rather difficult for the outsider to see. But it is no less difficult for the insider.

If a student in a fraternity or in a residence breaks a civil law, he is punished by due process of law, with proper publicity given the fact that he is a U of T student.

The only difference that could possibly be cited is that fraternity men break the law publicly more often than residence men, that fraternities by their very nature lead to vice. Such a claim is unqualified nonsense.

Abolition of fraternities or control of them by the Caput would accomplish nothing by itself.

Fraternities are not perfect angelic institutions, though no worse than any other student associations. But they could benefit from an inter-fraternity council of all campus fraternal organizations — an idea which was apparently blocked sometime last year.

Up to a point fraternities do have an obligation to the University, and have a duty as unofficial members of the university community to effect some over-all internal control of their organizations.

This should not involve university control in any respect; but there should perhaps be some association to counsel fraternities on their relations with the university, and the debt they owe it.

This is a concession — not unreasonable — that should be made by the fraternities. We would hope that the Caput, in its infinite wisdom and tolerance, would not seek more.

Don't say "Frats", it's beneath our dignity.

Campus Editors Say...

Varsity CUP Editor

sarcastically listed as leading to a certain "social awareness and sensitivity".

"It is time they, the students, learned that a university is not a country club where one acquires enough sentimental memories in four years to entertain himself for the rest of his life".

Commenting on the phrase "all education is propaganda", the McGill Daily said: "One of the things that our education in our society has been able to accomplish is to give freedom to the thinker who will not dare to fear".

The student who challenges social pressure "may return to the accepted code, but by this action he makes progress possible and prevents consequences more dangerous. The more students are aware of the propaganda in education and arm against it, the more value that education will have for them and for the rest of society".

The McGill pundits also wondered what student conferences accomplish.

"We doubt very much if any number of student organizations could actually do much to change the destiny of nations".

But the picture is not hopeless for though students do not "consciously" worry about relieving world tension, they do get to know each other's "tribal customs".

originality at UTDC—unconventional plays

"I was delighted by the choice of plays—they were unconventional to say the least." These were the opening words of Miss Araby Lockhart, the adjudicator at this year's UTDC One-Act Play Festival at Hart House.

On Monday and Tuesday night we were given the rare opportunity of seeing plays which we would normally never see presented in Canada—at long last the colleges seem to have gotten away from the old-stagers, that crop up again and again at drama festivals of this kind, and instead we were treated to an extremely unusual melange of contemporary works by Williams, Ionesco, Bergson, Chekhov and Samuel Beckett. The very fact that the colleges displayed such originality and daring in their choice of plays shows the value of the annual UTDC festival; this is just what should be happening on campus in the sphere of dramatic activities.

The two outstanding productions of the festival were without a doubt Trinity's "THE LESSON" by Eugene Ionesco and UC's "Endgame" by Samuel Beckett. Both these plays present director and actors with immense difficulties, both interpretive and technical. In "The Lesson", Ionesco is playing a game with the audience; his effects are all carefully calculated, so that he can alternate between scenes of comedy and tragedy without involving the feelings of the audience. His main preoccupation is with technicalities. Under Alison Cunningham's "competent direction" the play got off to a very slick start, and it was obvious that she and the actors grasped the essential technique required by Ionesco. Both Astrid Weyman (the Pup) and David Halton (the Professor) succeeded in giving us polished and imaginative interpretations of their roles; however, the Professor seemed to lose his way when the weight of the play rested on him alone, and we missed the subtle and gradual crescendo intended by Ionesco. Miss Lockhart commended Miss Weyman on her distinctive set, and described the whole production as "a very, very good try," though she bewailed the introduction of a man as the maid, it confused the issue. Samuel Beckett's "Endgame" was described by Miss Lockhart as "a coda to a work that is there only by implication," and as such lacked the dramatic form which was so essentially a part of the Ionesco play. However, the director, Warren Wilson, managed with great skill to build up and create dramatic situations, and throughout the one and a quarter hours of Beckett's verbal barrage, we constantly found ourselves held irresistibly by the subtle shadings which Mr. Wilson had woven into the seemingly plotless play. The actors gave the play vitality, and outstanding was John Harasti's performance of Hamm—an extremely difficult role, as the actor remains seated in a armchair behind a pair of dark glasses throughout the whole production—Harasti used his voice to the full effect, and we never once tired of his endless tirades—each had a new bite and point of interest.

Delightful moments of comic relief were provided by Sam Ajzenstat (Nagg) and Clov's constant excursions up the ladder. Altogether Warren Wilson wielded both his actors, and himself as Clov, and Mr. Beckett with a masterful hand. "Endgame" is a very strange play, but we certainly enjoyed it.

The other plays did not seem to come off so well—either on account of being badly chosen, or of the lack of technical know-how. Miss Lockhart lamented Vic's choice of Chekhov's "On The Highroad". It provides the audience with nothing to take home," she said, "and was totally unsuited to such an amateur group." The actors failed to bring the dreary Russian interlude on the highway to life, "it never came off the paper." The one redeeming element of the production was the effective lighting and set. Equally disappointing was the School of Nursing attempt at a Bergson comedy: "The Birthday Party". This time the fault was not inherent in the play, but in the total inability of the actors to put across the comedy of the situation. They were never at ease on the stage, and were lacking in the basic rudiments of acting, needed to bring off Bergson's humour and wit.

St. Michael's production of Tennessee Williams' "Auto-da-Fé" was an interesting one, but unfortunately did not make use of all that Williams' sordidness in extreme, and a slow, gradual but powerful working up to the climax, which should hit us with a wallop. Both the actors gave us convincing performances, and Sylvia Pegis as the old mother was especially pleasing to watch. She had the slow easy delivery that is required by Williams. Miss Lockhart felt that perhaps the director, Mollie Wade, had tended to rush her actors, and their placing on stage rather hindered Larry Grant's performance.

The success of these unusual productions was clearly indicated by Miss Lockhart's closing words, when she remarked that she had come to the festival fully prepared to warn all theatrically minded students to restrict their ventures to plays that were not outside the sphere of their own emotional and technical experience. However, after seeing the way in which the colleges had handled their ambitious undertakings, she had to admit that she was converted by their efforts, and urged them to continue to "go off-beat".

Success By Candle Light

Last night, the Victoria College Dramatic Society presented the Siegfried Geyer, P.G. Wodehouse comedy, "Candlelight" to an incredibly meagre audience (which made Tuesday night's UTDC audience seem in comparison "a multitude in transports of joy"). Despite the sense of futility which must arise from playing to an almost empty house, the cast managed to provide a thoroughly pleasant evening.

Though the action presumably takes place in Vienna at the turn of the century, the play does not suggest the wonderful decadent romanticism of the place or period; perhaps Mr. Wodehouse should be held responsible for removing most of the bite from Geyer's cynical utterances. At any rate, "Candlelight", possibly because it is an example of the comedy of manners, favoured by Oscar Wilde and Sir James M. Barrie, which no longer commands attention on our contemporary stage, amuses us without involving us. It is too languid to be great comedy, and too shallow to be much more than a protracted joke. In fact, it might have been much better as a one-acter than as a full-length play.

Dr. Ernest Waengler's direction was assured and inventive, although the pace of the show tended to remain on one level throughout. Terry Shiels turned in an excellent performance as the valet, while Bob Martin, despite making the Prince appear too much like an American businessman, was a suave and entertaining example of the decaying aristocracy. Linda Tilden's Marie was nothing less than delightful, but Pat Cock tended to rush mechanically through her motions, and thus sacrifice much of the humour of her part. A fine supporting cast included John Rumball, Peter Fraser, Gerry Dawson and Pat Gordon.

One major fault of the production, however, were the intermissions. In order to sustain the comedy, intermissions should be kept under ten minutes. If the fifteen-minute intermissions last night were intended to stretch out the time of play, it also helped decrease our interest in what was to follow.

It is regrettable that the students of Victoria College are not supporting their dramatic society. Their production of "Candlelight" is a solid success, with a play which, if not as brilliant as Anouilh's "Thieves' Carnival" last year, at least cannot be turned into so absolute a fiasco by anything but a first rate company.

Flaming Mame

That indomitable lady of 3 Beekman Place, Auntie Mame, who swept through literary and dramatic phases, is now commanding the screen at the Imperial, in a bright and gaudy entertainment of some two hours and twenty minutes.

Rosalind Russell as Mame cuts a wide swath through cocktail parties, schools both prep and progressive, C.O.D.'s at Macy's, the Peckwood fox hunt, the Knickerbocker Bank, and the Upson daquiri, as she guides her little love, Patrick, tenderly but erratically from 1928 to 1946. Miss Russell attacks her role with tremendous gusto, compelling us to laughter and tears with equal conviction, not afraid to pull all the stops out in a moment of tenderness. Mame may be witty, flippant, avant-garde, but she loves that boy like a mother, which director Morton DaCosta shrewdly realises will endear her to matinee audiences as well as sophisticates.

The supporting cast is a strong one. Forrest Tucker as Beauregard is the incarnation of a perfect southern gentleman. Joanna Barnes as Gloria, Patrick's rich Connecticut fiancée (in Upper Richmond Girls School girl), has a bored, brittle drawl, that is beautifully accurate. The only miscast character seems to be Coral Browne as Vera. Vera's "Mayfair" English is a thin veneer over the harsh accents of her native Pittsburgh, and her funniest lines are written for a slam-bang American intonation. Miss Browne's English is straight from the West End and this just a little at first. However, she warms to the part, and has a fine time at the party with the Upsons.

In writing the screenplay, Betty Comden and Adolph Green have followed the stage version almost word for word. There are one or two concessions to familiarity: a reference to Alice B. Toklas is changed to Boswell; Fannie Hurst becomes Edna Ferber. A short concession to the production code finds Agnes married to Brian O'Bannon, not abandoned with the stigma of the unwed mother. The greatest changes were made from book to stage play. One wonders why playwrights Lee and Lawrence made such wild caricatures of Mr. Babcock and the Upsons. Here Mame does not have to come to grips with a real situation, but only knock over a set of wooden puppets. She deserves a stronger challenge.

But quibbles are small things when there is so much to delight the eye and ear. Beautifully costumed, lavishly mounted in six spectacular changes of set, Auntie Mame is a gay kaleidoscopic farce, mixed with wit and sentiment, moving at razzle-dazzle speed from beginning to end.

Ya Gotta Have Heart!

The concert at Eaton Auditorium featuring Josh White and family on Wednesday night was entertaining, commercially and artistically successful, but by god it was bad, compared to the Odette miracle on the same stage a few weeks ago.

"Sixteen Tons", "Cindy", "Half as Much" and other pure straight pop-tunes on the program gave the whole scene a weak effect. The major fault with the concert lay with the programming. People had turned out expecting to hear great folk music, and the few work-songs and blues proved that at least old Josh himself and his pretty daughter Beverly could have performed admirably in that genre. Unfortunately a disproportionate amount of time was given to Josh White Jr., who seemed to be concerned with perfecting a smooth ballad technique in the Cole and Matthews style, even when given pseudo-folk material and a handsome deep voice.

The opening number "Good Morning Blues" with able assistance from Toronto bassist, Jack Lander, set an expectant mood. Josh White sang with finesse and experience, his guitar chords were just a bit side of rock and roll, his voice just a bit weak in the upper register. The later numbers had a little of the true earthy feeling, but not the communicative power that one has come to expect from his early records. Nevertheless, selections such as "Hard-time Blues" by Josh, and "Nobody Knows when you are down and out" by Beverly, were thrilling essays of sound and content.

Josh has a pleasant voice and miserable diction; some of the humour in the older ballads was completely lost because of mumbled lines. We have mentioned the weakness in higher notes, but this was compensated by expert stagemanship.

An ironic note was struck at the end of the concert with "We Got Nothing But the Blues", too bad they had too much of everything else.

At the close of the concert, the audience clapped their approval, thanking the performers for high calibre entertainment, quickly left their seats, perhaps wistfully recalling the surging emotional ovation given to Odette, a true artist in the same field. An artist who, unlike the Whites, communicated something apart from the show: feeling.

Blood Clinic Might Close

The only thing that will interrupt the U of T blood drive when it swings into action on Feb. 16 will be an act of God — or a case of heart-lung surgery.

For this type of surgery, known donors must be used. The operation requires from 8-10 pints of blood, and frequently occurs six times a week in Toronto.

In such a case, the Red Cross would interrupt the clinic in operation on campus to receive the specific type of blood needed.

As whole blood cannot be manufactured and cannot be kept indefinitely, it must be supplied constantly by donors.

Toronto needs 1,500 pints of it a day.

The campus campaign hopes to exceed 2,500 pints of it during the week of Feb. 16-20.

The clinic will be held at the School of Nursing on St. George St., and possibly at two other locations.

Pucksters Back Again Blues, Redmen Clash

THE GOLD-DUST TWINS, of Marlie fame, will not perform as a defensive unit tonight. Ron Casey (left) will be moved to left wing while Harry Neale (right) will remain at defence.

(Michael Burns)

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

Tonight is the first opportunity Varsity Hockey fans have to see their Cinderella Blues play since that great game Dec. 17.

Visiting Blues are their old arch-rivals, McGill Redmen. For those who like to see a free-wheeling, high scoring game—and who doesn't—don't miss this one.

McGill are not a spectacular defensive unit, having relinquished 34 goals in three games, but they are big and rugged up front.

Stocky right-winger Ivan Saunders is Redmen's high scorer, as well as a capable "mixer upper" (such language). Joe Irwin and Joe Poirier, both of football fame, are also pretty adept at the ice game. Huge defenseman Ed Roberts, 6'2" and 200 pounds, tends to influence a heads up attitude in opposing forwards. McGill also boast a Toronto boy Darragh Vanplew.

This is a "must" game for Redmen if they wish to remain in the running. Blues, naturally, can't afford to drop this one either if they foster ambitions to nose out Laval.

Although expecting little trouble with McGill, Varsity sharpshooters will be out to take the lead in the individual scoring race.

Ray Dunn, looking very sharp at workouts, will probably start in the Varsity nets.

Bill (Bear) Kennedy has been shifted back to center between Dunc (Nalls) Brodie and former gold-duster Ron Casey.

Mike Ejik remains with his old cronies Grant Mills and John Macdonald, as Blues' starting line.

Former Whitby Dunlop, Doug Williams, commands the kid-line of Howie (Lil' Bar) Roth and Jim Brooks.

Lorry Stacey and Dave Stephen have teamed up at the Blue line while the inimitable fat man Harry Neale will prowl the rearguard with Neil Munro.

Frank Sullivan, who in his last outing handed out one of the hardest body checks we have ever seen, will skate at utility.

For some of the finest entertainment in sport offered on the campus, we'll see you at the game tonight. You bet, there'll be free skating afterwards!

It has finally happened — a real sports column just for the girls. Pam Hill (she mentioned my name so I have to mention hers) wrote the first one on Wednesday and now it is my turn.

There is only one small problem about all this — what shall I write? I have an idea about the subject on which I am supposed to ramble. John Brooks, our sensible, serious and sober, yes I AM talking about John Brooks, sports editor made sure that I knew just what was expected of me before he relinquished this corner. That is probably the reason for the preceding.

I am supposed to write on, around and/or about subjects remotely or even directly connected with the athletic endeavors of the coeds of this and other universities.

Thus, with that very exact advice in mind, I will choose a subject and begin. The subject? Why, volleyball of course. Excluding hockey which Pam there I mentioned her again has already discussed, what which Pam there I mentioned her again has already discussed, what which Pam there I mentioned her again has already discussed, what could be more appropriate? With the girls' senior intercollegiate volleyball team recently chosen and two tournaments approaching in the very near future, there should be lots to discuss.

The team will be composed of Janet Huston, Judy Canfield, Linda Kriisa, Mary Lou Hagan, Jutta Lauf, Vilu Kanep, Signy Paulso, Esta Halpren, Fran Halsall, Sharon Gilmor, (all of the preceding are from PHE) Joan Belcis (UC) and Mary Louthier (nurs). Seems as if PHE has a monopoly.

One of the two tournaments scheduled will be an exhibition round-robin series which will be played January 20 at the OCE gym. Participating teams will be U of T, McMaster and OAC. These games will actually just be warm-up for the girls who will get down to more serious business at the beginning of February when they will travel to Queens for the Intercollegiate volleyball tournament.

In this latter tournament last year, the Toronto girls placed third behind Western and Queens respectively. This year they hope to move up two notches to the winner's position and I, for one, think they have a very good chance of accomplishing their aims.

This year's squad will have an experienced core with five of its twelve players having played in this tournament before. In addition to these "veterans" is Vilu Kanep, a PHE (naturally) Freshie, who played on the Canadian championship team last year. All but one of the remaining girls have played, using the single volley, at the university before.

This idea of the single volley is another reason I think the Toronto team will be one jump ahead of the other teams. All U of T girls were compelled to use the single volley last year, whether they played interfacult or intercollegiate. None of the other universities played interfacult or intercollegiate. Thus had this ruling, which will be enforced in this year's tourney. Thus had this ruling, which will be enforced in this year's tourney. Thus had this ruling, which will be enforced in this year's tourney.

Recent events from as widespread and unusual places as Winnipeg, Manitoba and the Toronto Board of Control, may have a great effect on University of Toronto athletics in the next academic year.

First, and perhaps most important, comes the word that two Toronto soccer leagues are in difficulty. One league has no park in which to play, the other has residents near its field up in arms.

The Canadian Continental Soccer League, which has used Millen Stadium on Danforth Avenue, has been ousted by plans to run the Don Valley Expressway through the centre of the popular park.

The league was informed by the city Wednesday that it will not be able to schedule games in the park this year, as demolition crews prepare to move in.

And the National Soccer League, sole owners of Fred Hamilton Park on Shaw Street, between Dundas and College Streets, have incurred the wrath of citizens who reside near the field.

A petition was submitted to Board of Control requesting the city to take steps to eliminate litter, parking problems, nightly noise and walking on lawns. That's a pretty sizeable request even for the city fathers.

One proposal has been for the city to reacquire the park, which they sold to the National Soccer League for $50,000 two years ago. The League had, before that, held a 99-year lease on the stadium.

And just how do these events affect this university? They are of great interest because of our dark, silent stadium which will, under present circumstances, be without football on some Saturdays in the approaching autumn.

The Argonauts are gone to the windy shores of Lake Ontario, and for the first time since professional football hit Toronto, will play home games in surroundings unfamiliar to their faithful followers.

It was felt in some circles that, when the university realized the Argos were not long for this campus, efforts should have been initiated to bring big league soccer — Canada's most flourishing sport — into Varsity Stadium.

The boat was apparently missed. But Lady Luck — a kind, old mistress — is smiling again. Immediate investigation and action by university athletic officials might uncover a gold mine in disguise.

Because, when the Argonauts packed their trunks for their journey south, they took with them a revenue for the university that ran as high as $100,000 a year on occasion.

The soccer leagues would not, possibly, reach that figure, but it would certainly ease the minds of our financial wizards whose head-scratching can be heard far beyond the walls of Hart House.

The athletic association has always prided itself on being able to exist without subsidy from the university (excluding, of course, the athletic fee payable by each undergraduate).

It is a safe bet that Phil Loosier, Warren Stevens and the Athletic Directorate would be happy to maintain that tradition.

From Winnipeg yesterday, came the second event of which we spoke a few paragraphs ago. The Canadian Football League annual meeting heard — glumly — that television may not return to Big Four football in the 1959 season.

For the past three seasons a juicy contract — held originally by the Dow Brewery — has netted the Big Four an annual chunk totalling $330,000.

No bidder for TV rights in the next season has come close to matching that figure, and unless one does, professional football in the east may return to the old standby — radio.

Once again, why the interest to our university? Simply this, Warren Stevens has been probing the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's reaction to possible television of Intercollegiate games next season.

He has a meeting scheduled next week with George Retzlaff, local CBC sports boss, and Jack McCabe, national chief of the CBC's athletic telecasts.

First reaction from the TV people lay in an opinion that the people of Canada wanted pro football, and that's what they get. College ball, suggested the CBC, held less interest.

That situation may be changed somewhat. There are, of course, major difficulties e.g. obtaining a sponsor (and it's not likely the university would be happy with a beer company).

But TV is worth investigating, and it's not impossible. Gate receipts might suffer, but the money received from television rights (if you'll pardon the expression) ain't chickenfeed.

Track Team On Tour

Fred Foote, Canada's track coach in the 1956 Olympic Games, and now coach of the University of Toronto team, has announced a four-match program for his indoor track crew.

The first event of the four — all away — will be at the Michigan State relays on February 7. The following week, the team visits Buffalo State.

On March 7, Coach Foote leads his crew against Ypsilanti and then travels to Hamilton on March 21.

Individual instruction is available in the Upper Gym in Hart House each weekday at 5 p.m. with the exception of Tuesday, when intramural events are held.

Cagers Open Season At First Athletic Night

University of Toronto basketball Blues will be out to break a losing streak tomorrow night when they host McGill Redmen in the feature presentation of the winter season's first Athletic Night in Hart House.

Blues dropped their thirteenth in a row — 69-61 decision to Buffalo State Teachers — in Buffalo Wednesday night. Their only wins have been in pre-season exhibition games against local teams.

Tomorrow's game opens the Intercollegiate season for Varsity. Assumption, by virtue of twin victories last weekend, leads the pack. The Purple Lancers dumped McGill, 66-63.

Redmen opened the campaign ing.

with only three veterans of college ball — Ken Cole, John Finch and Tom Richards — but their squad was bolstered recently by the return of veteran Herm Zloklikovits.

The senior game gets underway at 8:30, preceded by an intermediate exhibition tilt between Varsity Baby Blues and Andy's Athletic Club Juniors. Game time is 6:30 p.m.

Other events adding sparkle to the evening — which costs the ATL card-equipped student only 50 cents — include a water polo game between Toronto Hungarians and Young Men's Hebrew Association, and exhibition Intercollegiate box-

Duplessis Comes Across Establishes Student Fund

Quebec university students may have won the first round in an economic battle with provincial Premier Maurice Duplessis.

The prime minister Wednesday released the text of a proposed bill establishing a $10,000,000 provincial student-aid fund.

The proposed legislation is in line with promises made by Duplessis to Quebec student groups meeting with him last summer and fall.

Qualifications for aid under the new plan include demonstration of financial need, satisfactory scholastic standing, good behavior, and residence in Quebec for the five years previous to university admission.

Provisions include maximum grants of $300 for students residing in the same city as their university, and $500 for those attending universities in cities where they do not live.

The bill raises amount given outright to 60 from 50 per cent of the scholarship. The remaining sum must be repaid within two years of graduation.

A special provision in the bill allows the Youth Minister to make an additional loan of $200 per year to students residing in the town in which they study, and $500 to those who study in cities other than those in which they live.

The special loans can only be made if specified grants are not sufficient to enable the student to continue his studies. Loans must be repaid within two years of graduation at a three percent interest rate.

The released text stresses that education is wholly within the province's jurisdiction. It provides that students under 21 years of age may be legally bound by obligations assumed under the plan.

The bill is the first attempt on the part of the province of Quebec to regulate student aid programs. The present system of aid-to-youth bursaries is set up on a discretionary, year-to-year basis.

The Association of Quebec University Students, represented by student presidents of Quebec's six universities, fought for almost a year before they were granted an interview with Duplessis early in December.

Hints of the plan, however, were given by Duplessis this summer in an interview with an independent group of students called the University Action League. The League has been accused of being Duplessis-controlled by other Quebec university students.

Raise In Fees Rumored, Unconfirmed By Officials

Simcoe Hall Friday neither confirmed nor denied unofficial statements that next September would see an across-the-board fee increase for students.

Administration vice-president F. R. Stone said suggestions for a fee increase had come from numerous quarters of the university. But, he said, it was purely speculation to say a decision had been made.

Several recommendations for fee increases from different faculties were now being studied by the Administration. The Administration will forward these to the Board of Governors, he said.

Mr. Stone said the majority of the American universities were planning fee increases McGill and the University of British Columbia hiked fees last term.

"We are now well down the list in terms of students' fee costs," he said. "We will try and get more revenue from industry and government but with the pressure on us we cannot help considering fees as a source."

U of T last boosted its fees seven per cent in 1957.

Besides fee-raise applications from academic branches of the university, requests have or will come from the Athletic Association and the Students' Administrative Council.

Unofficial Simcoe Hall sources say a $5 athletic fee increase has already been granted. The student representative to the commission says he has heard no word of this.

SAC president Vince Kelly said last night the SAC will request a $3 increase in its upcoming budget.

Move To Farm

Prof Quits To Foster Idea

An attempt to develop a new theory of world government will take a Trinity College philosophy professor to the life of a Peterborough farmer next year.

Professor Bruno Morawetz, who has taught political and moral philosophy at Trinity for eight years, last week announced his resignation, effective next June.

The announcement followed an appearance by Prof. Morawetz at a panel discussion where he tentatively mentioned his theory of world government.

However Prof. Morawetz said the need to develop his theory was not the only reason behind his resignation. "I have been considering a change in my vocation for some time," he said.

His theory, which he calls "temporalism", was not as yet a completely developed system, Prof. Morawetz said. "It is merely an attempt to remove one obstacle to world peace," he said.

That obstacle is the division of people into geographical units, leading to nationalism.

"The purpose of temporalism, Prof. Morawetz said, "is to get away from geographical representation."

To get away from geographical and hence nationalistic divisions Prof. Morawetz suggests the development of a more arbitrary division based on the month of a person's birth. Representation in a world government would be based on this twelvefold division of the world.

"Toynbee and I have seen eye to eye on this," Prof. Morawetz said. "He too believes that if the world is to survive there must be an end of territorial sovereignty."

Prof. Morawetz said that he had noticed similar tendencies in the thought of Albert Einstein. "Einstein once said that government should represent people, not parties," he said.

Temporalism still needs thought and development, Prof. Morawetz said. "I have been thinking about it for a year," he said, "but it is not really completely ready to be made public yet. I mentioned it briefly at the panel discussion and it got into the papers."

Plans Completed — PC's To Meet

Plans for the first student-organized, student-run political conference to be held in Canada have now been completed, Del O'Brien, I Law, said last night.

O'Brien, conference co-ordinator for the Progressive Conservative Student Federation of Canada, said plans for the PCSF's Ontario-Quebec regional conference have now been finalized.

The conference, to be called the Macdonald-Cartier Conference, is the first of its kind to be held anywhere in Canada. It's planned to make the conference an annual event.

"The idea for regional conferences grew out of the Caledon weekend developed by the University of Toronto Conservative club," O'Brien said.

"It's the first political conference exclusively for university students ever organized in the history of this country," he added.

The conference will be held in Ottawa Feb. 13-15, with O'Brien as chairman.

Purpose of the conference is twofold: "to develop a Canadian Conservatism for university students and to promote better understanding of Canadian Conservative policies," O'Brien said.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker is among the leaders of the Conservative party who are expected to attend the conference sessions. Others who will be taking part include Hon. Davie Fulton, Minister of Justice, and Hon. Alvin Hamilton, Minister of Northern Affairs.

Senate Speaker Mark Drouin, and MP's David Walker (Toronto - Rosedale) and Douglas Jung (Vancouver Centre) will also address conference sessions.

"Form of the conference is essentially the same as the one we employed in our Caledon weekends," O'Brien said.

"It's strictly a student conference to try and educate students and to allow students to air their problems and views before government and party leaders," he said.

"It will be run on the seminar principle — relevant papers will be presented by students and then general discussion will take over."

Topics to be brought under discussion will include Canadian foreign affairs and policy, the economic aspects of Canada, Conservative philosophy and history, and the Bill of Rights.

Reports of the seminar proceedings will be prepared and published in book form," he said.

Similar regional conferences will be held in Winnipeg and Halifax in the near future.

Frye Announced Victoria Principal

Professor H. Northrop Frye, English professor, author, theology graduate and scholar will be Victoria College's next principal, it was announced yesterday.

Head of the Vic English department, Prof. Frye will succeed Dr. Harold Bennett who retires June 30.

An authority on William Blake and modern literary criticism, Prof. Frye is the author of such books as "Fearful Symmetry", a study of Blake, and "Anatomy of Criticism".

Prof. Frye has said he believes education is the basis of democracy. "One concept cannot exist without the other."

Not only is education essential to democracy, he says, but "when people become educated they want to take on the democratic responsibilities."

He recently said on campus that the role of education is "to make people maladjusted."

Prof. Frye was born in Sherbrooke, Quebec, and raised in Moncton, New Brunswick.

He graduated from Victoria in 1933 and, from Emmanuel College in 1936.

The winner of a Royal Society

Fellowship to Oxford, he received his Master of Arts in Honor English there.

He joined the staff of Victoria College in 1939.

Prof. Frye is known as a strong supporter of the humanities.

The future principal was in bed with the flu and unavailable for comment last night.

Campus Song Writer Makes Television Sale

Two of the songs especially written for "The Dedicated Men", the Mickities '59 presentation, have been purchased by television interests, show officials said last night.

The songs, entitled "Choo, Choo Train" and "You're So Wonderful", were written by Jim Doris, IV SMC, who has written the score for the entire show.

The songs are now being arranged for recording and will be released within the next three weeks.

"I don't know as yet who will be recording them", Doris said last night.

Billed as "a fresh and sparkling original type of musical-comedy, the likes of which the campus has never seen or probably will not see for a long time to come", "The Dedicated Men" will hit the boards in the Royal Ontario Museum theatre Jan. 29-31.

The presentation, with screenplay by Gino Matteo and score by Jimmy Doris, has attracted considerable attention from the professional entertainment world.

One professional firm, described only as "a reputable TV concern", is reported to be "extremely interested in purchasing the script."

Tickets for the show, priced at $1, have been on sale at St. Mike's for over a week, and booths will be set up at various faculties on campus during this week.

Russ Education Isn't Novel, Speaker Says

The West has been "misled" in its picture of the alleged high standard of Soviet education, a former registrar of the University of Sopron, Hungary, presently employed by U of T, said last night.

Speaking to the St. Clement's Anglican Church University forum, Dr. W. Szenci said the press has misled people into considering only the difference between the American and Russian educational systems.

Actually, he said, the Soviet system is, in nearly all respects, the same as the European.

Tracing the changes in Soviet education since the revolution, Dr. Szenci said the Communists'

A Doubt and Prophecy are Answered Here

By LIZ BINKS
Varsity Features Editor

During the closing session of this year's McGill Conference on World Affairs, a French-Canadian publisher prophesied that Canada might become completely bi-lingual within the next 15 years.

His claim was countered by now-list Hugh MacLennan who argued that without vastly improved French instruction in schools outside Quebec the dream would never be realized.

A walk to the corner of St. George St. and Lawther Ave. might prove of interest to both.

There, in what was once a private home, 64 girls from various parts of Ontario are adding a new dimension to their high-school curriculum.

Toronto's only bi-lingual high-school, Ville Marguerite Bourgeoys, may well, within the next 15 years, add new significance to the MCWA prophecy.

In 1939, demand from Toronto's already large French population (it now numbers roughly 45,000) saw the arrival of Sister Superior Marie Felicien from the teaching order of the Congregation de Notre Dame in Montreal.

She began a French-English course for grades one and two; the next year with a helper it extended to grade four.

By 1948, with another sister on the staff, the school set up the full eight primary grades in a new Sherbourne St. building.

The high school began four years later because, "We found it discouraging and useless to stop it at grade eight. Within only a couple of years, they had lost all facility for the language", Sister Felicien said.

After a brief stay in the CCF headquarters on Jarvis St., Ville Marguerite moved to its present home at 157 St. George, where, in six years, the enrolment doubled to 64 and a $1,500.00 expansion plan got underway.

On a curriculum that adheres closely to that laid down by the Ontario Department of Education, only two subjects — French and English — are not taught interchangeably in both languages.

"In History, Maths, Science or Latin, a sister may teach in whatever language strikes her fancy", Sister Felicien said.

"Most of our students are bi-lingual before they come here because they have attended either the school in Toronto or elsewhere".

"We have seven girls in grade 9 this year who had never had any French in their lives before. For them only will the sister transate — and they are usually ready to follow the regular program by grade 10".

Up to that time, the "English" students find it hard sledding. "We only take girls who have had top marks in the past", the sister added. "Otherwise they would not be able to cope with the work".

"And above all we insist that the girl herself want to learn French. It is no use trying to teach them if their parents are the only eager party. For at least a year they have to take separate exams and usually find they are near the bottom of the class".

This year 1/3 of the grade nine class is new to French. We saw them in action with "Boum Boum", a story familiar to most Ontario students — at about the grade 11 level.

It was a feat in itself to recognize the story. Answers flowed in rapid, fluid French; the sister stopped only three times to translate, only twice to correct pronunciation.

The "English" students faltered little in their reading; showed quick comprehension in answering questions. They would have done credit to an average grade 12 class.

Once we caught a trace of a French Canadian "r" and asked if the girl were from Quebec. The answer was no; all the students are from Ontario — mostly Toronto.

In grades 11 and 12, 21 girls breezed through a class in 18th century French literature and an extract from Montesquieu's "Esprit des Lois". Here there was no need for translation — the girls were questioning thought not word meanings.

"When we first came to Toronto", Sister Felicien told us, "some of the newspapers wrote articles saying the plan was ridiculous. Throughout the whole of Toronto we met opposition. Once two of the girls were overheard speaking French on a streetcar and told to speak English".

"During the last 10 years the city has changed a great deal. Just the other day a clerk in a store began to converse in French with me when she heard me talking".

"Still the girls must work very hard — they come from such an English atmosphere. But because we have to extract more from them than the average teacher, I feel they are better prepared for advanced study. And most of our graduates do well in senior matriculation".

In the Fall of last year, James Cardinal McGuigan appointed the Rev. J. Bouvier — pastor of Sacred Heart parish where the primary school is held — to direct an expansion campaign for the high school.

The immediate goal is $1,500,000 to secure the Donalda Farms property in Don Mills. From here the school hopes to include grade 13, a boarding school of between 80 and 100 (it now numbers 18), and eventually a boys schools.

The nine sisters at Ville Marguerite Bourgeoys are making an invaluable contribution to the bi-linguality that is Canada. If they succeed, the significance of their accomplishment is truly exciting. Their work is an answer to the educator's dream and a formidable challenge to the prejudice of some of their countrymen that is threatening to erase Canada's unique position from the world map.

The publisher's vision and the novelist's doubts were both valid. The sisters of Notre Dame may prove them both right.

U of T Delegation Off To Mock UN

A four-man delegation will represent the University of Toronto at next month's second annual Model United Nations in Montreal.

More than 200 delegates from some 50 universities throughout the United States and Canada are expected to attend the Model UN, to be held at the University of Montreal Feb. 4-7.

The chairman of the U of T's UN Club, Mike Biggar (III Trin), last night said the four delegates will have their $15 registration fee paid by the club, and the club "would be approaching the SAC to try and get funds to cover transportation costs".

Forty-nine universities, 33 American and 16 Canadian, have already notified the conference's organizers that they will be sending delegations.

"Oxford University in England and the Sorbonne in Paris will be represented at the conference, and an invitation has been sent to the University of Moscow," he said.

"No answer has as yet been received from the Russian university," he added.

The conference, organized jointly by Montreal, Laval, McGill, Sir George Williams and Loyola Universities, will be under the chairmanship of Zafar Khan, a McGill student.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker, Opposition Leader Lester Pearson and Mayor Sarto Fournier of Montreal have consented to be the conference's honorary patrons.

Meetings of the Security Council, the General Assembly and the International Court of justice will be held throughout the three-day conference.

On Wed. Feb. 4 a Security Council agenda debate and a meeting of the General Assembly will be held, on Thursday a General Assembly emergency session will be staged and a regular General Assembly session will be held on Friday, the last day of the conference.

A banquet and an International Gala Ball will close the conference.

Topic which will be discussed include: a consideration of the Berlin crisis, the present Middle Eastern situation, and proposals for the elimination of foreign military bases in Asia.

"The Toronto delegation will be representing New Zealand in the sessions," Biggar said last night.

Applicants for the conference should "be interested in the activities of the UN, and should be fairly experienced in public speaking," he said.

Applications should be submitted to the SAC office.

Israel, A World Away Truth Not Absent

By HARVEY L. SHEPHERD
Varsity News Editor

A bright forenoon sun glared through the stained-glass window of the Hart House Great Hall yesterday on the yarmolka of the Jewish and into the eyes of the curious. Half a world away, the sun was hot over Israel.

Yesterday these places seemed close — too close.

Between 11 and 11:30 a.m. they did not seem so. To anyone, the flowering of the State of Israel is, in varying degrees, an inspiring thing, and among Jews a certain extra reverence is both expected and admired.

It did not push itself forward at first. The disembodied voices of the Beth Tzedec Choir, sounding anonymously and beautifully from the balcony and answered from the unadorned hall front by cantor Joseph Cooper, could, in their esoteric tongue, have been voices crying sweetly in an ethical wilderness.

"For the Lord is good," Rabbi Aaron M. Kamenik read, "his kindness is forever; his faithfulness endures to all generations."

We read from Psalm 146: "Put not your trust in princes. Nor in the son of man in whom there is no help."

The readings, single and congregational, preceded by lines of Hebrew and interspersed with timeless and beautiful melodic singing, spiritual from above, continued:

"Our fathers put their trust in Thee and Thou didst teach them the law of life."

"And these words, which I command thee this day shall be upon thy heart."

"Grant us peace, Thy most precious gift, O Thou eternal source of peace and enable Israel to be a messenger of peace unto all."

"May all the inhabitants of the world perceive and know that unto thee every knee must bend, every tongue vow loyalty."

U of T Chancellor Samuel Beatty read from the Book of Proverbs — a plea for ethics.

The sermon was preceded by a hymn in Hebrew.

The sermon was delivered by Dr. Bernard Cherrick, who teaches at the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, Israel.

His text was not from the Torah, not from the law or the prophets.

His text was from the statesman David Ben-Gurion, now prime minister of Israel.

His text concerned politics but it overreached politics and was less than politic.

"Our mandate," Mr. Ben-Gurion once said, "is the Bible."

Dr. Cherrick's message also seemed somehow less than religious. The State of Israel has a cultural heritage, he stressed, which belongs not only to its citizens.

It applies also to all Jews he said, and even to the whole western world.

And as a state rose Biblical once more, Dr. Cherrick said, the story of another, also Biblical, Israel was illuminated by the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

And the Law and the Prophets, which, for Dr. Cherrick, gave modern Israel authenticity, were given further authenticity by the scrolls.

The stories of Israel and the scrolls are exciting.

But the Hebrew hymn which ended the service, as the voices of the unseen choir rang downward, brought a message which transcends language, of a joy which has proved greater than persecution and still extends beyond the cultures of princes or the causes of the sons of men.

Although Dr. Cherrick gave us a panegyric of authenticity, truth was not absent.

Outing Club

The U of T Outing Club has invited anyone interested in two days skiing in the Laurentians Feb. 6-8 to attend a meeting of the club Wednesday.

Reservations for the weekend must be made in advance, and will be on a first-come-first-served basis, club president Michael Berger said last night.

Cost of the weekend will be $18 for paid members and $19 for all others.

The meeting will be in Carr Auditorium, St. Michael's College at 8 p.m.

The club's future plans include outings to the Port Credit River, Don Mills and Coalingwood.

Hope For Big Future At North York Centre

A mood of cautious hope underlies a new plan for adult education that had its first birthday last week.

But the men behind the plan — "The Centre" — hope the centre for adult education established by the North Toronto YMCA will eventually mature into a college similar to Sir George Williams College in Montreal.

Friday, Ontario Education Minister Dunlop presented certificates to the first 100 members of the centre who started classes this fall.

"We haven't got any specific ambitions or objectives except the immediate one of providing another opportunity," chairman Reginald Bundy said.

"But Sir George Williams got its start from night classes. We could go almost anywhere," he said.

He added there is no connection between The Centre and the proposed York University.

Need Help

The Varsity, half way through its publishing session 1958-59, still wants, any needs, staff of all kinds.

We need reporters, green or seasoned, make-up editors of all shapes, editorial writers and camp-followers.

But most of all, we need reporters to help us through these last lingering months and supply a backbone for the year to come.

Do drop in, won't you.

pride

Occasionally news items that have little direct connection with global events and even seem to have little connection with each other converge to provide a moment of insight into the great struggles the world faces.

It is, for instance, ironic, yet perversely instructive that Prof. Bruno Morawetz's deeply felt plea against national and territorial boundaries should have been published in the same paper in which a blushing reproduction of Leslie Frost's design for a national Canadian flag appeared.

It seems that during the same period in which Prof. Morawetz was doing the careful thinking that resulted in a plan to ensure world peace by breaking down geographical barriers, the Premier of Ontario was doing the careless doodling that resulted in a flag to ensure Canadian pride by bolstering those barriers.

It is not yet time to make any sweeping comments on Prof. Morawetz's suggestions. Later this week when The Varsity publishes the details of the plan will be a more appropriate time to give it a fuller examination.

But even before details are known, Prof. Morawetz's plan takes up its natural position in opposition to Mr. Frost's leafy ensign.

Perhaps it is illegitimate to extend this antithesis until it becomes the heart of the world's trouble.

But then again, perhaps the simple juxtaposition of these two stories lays down a truer line of demarcation between good and evil in international affairs than does the more familiar antithesis between east and west.

Perhaps, too, the ultimate choice that we can be called upon to make will not be between the sometimes almost indistinguishable forces of Communist materialism and western materialism but between a man who thinks his way toward a law of love that brings peace and a man who doodles his way toward a law of pride that brings war. SA and puffins

Close to the beginning of last term an editorial appeared in this paper deploring, among other things, the presence of Puffin books in the U of T's new bookstore.

Since then the bookstore has become a very pleasant place to browse around in, and on the rare occasion even a pleasant place to buy in. It almost makes us feel that we are being taken seriously.

But we are beginning to have second thoughts. The other day we went into the bookstore and there was not a puffin to be found. We should have been delighted but instead we realized that with its last refuge gone the poor little puffin may become just as extinct as the whooping crane or the kiwi.

We therefore suggest that the bookstore give some thought to setting up in a secluded corner a puffin preserve where that delicate little bird could live out its life in peace.

The preserve could be set up in the same corner where the bookstore now keeps another rare bird, a bird that possesses only a right wing and is known as the American Mercury. SA

"We are at war now"

By Dunc Edmonds and Don Morin

Four years ago students and faculty on the Texas A & M campus organized the first student conference on National Affairs with their purpose being:

—To conduct a series of informative and stimulating discussions on the role of the United States in world affairs.

—To provide an appreciation of the complexities of American Foreign Policy to an increasingly larger number of college students in the South and Southwest.

—By a serious exchange of ideas between students over a period of years, to help promote a generation of responsible leaders in international affairs.

The management of the entire Conference is handled completely by the "Aggie" students. They solicit money and other assistance from local Texas business corporations and from their Congressmen. They utilized the Research staff from the Library of Congress which sent all delegates an excellent pre-conference brochure with all manner of background material for discussion of national and international affairs. SCONA has become a year-round proposition for the Aggie students, with election to one of the SCONA committees being considered a distinct honour on the campus.

The Conference was attended by some 150 delegates representing educational institutions from the South and the Southwest, with 2 delegates from Mexico and 4 Canadians invited to give an outside point of view.

The 3 1/2 day Conference was broken down into five plenary sessions and five smaller discussion periods. In each of the plenary sessions we were addressed by an outside speaker of very high calibre and in the discussion periods we roamed over all the world. The discussion periods were ably conducted by professors from the South and from several other American institutions.

The Round Table discussion groups provided us with our best opportunity for coming to better understand the American student. It was here that we gained our main impressions. We admit the dangers of generalization, but on the whole, the 4 Canadian delegates found themselves in complete agreement with these impressions. We found the students interested in the problems, only mildly concerned over them, liberally minded, quite ashamed over the segregation issue in their country (this is not to say that they favored integration by any means and it should be noted in passing that there were no negroes at the Conference). The students were vehemently opposed to the Eisenhower-Dulles team, in favour of recognizing Red China, confused over Berlin and very poorly informed as to the Middle East and the Far East.

We noted a lack of historical perspective and as well a lack of an open speculative mind as we dealt with such concepts as Nationalism, Socialism, Communism, Imperialism, Colonialism and Americanism. The average delegate knew very little about Canada and they all exhibited keen interest in our lectures of the French Canadian problem, the Commonwealth, our Political System and our Independence.

A synopsis of the views of some of the delegates is interest-

Dunc Edmonds (IV Pol. Sci.) and Don Morin (IV Meds) were U of T delegates last term to a Student Conference on National Affairs sponsored by the Texas Agricultural and Mechanical College. Below are some of their impressions.

ing. There was general agreement that America's Race problem at home greatly lowered her prestige abroad, and further that integration would in the future alleviate many of the social pressures and tensions presently increasing in America. There were strong views put forth by some of the Mississippi and Alabama delegates to the effect that northern liberal pressures were creating a problem in their society of the South that had hitherto not existed. There was general agreement that Latin America had been too much ignored by the States and that there should be a large increase in exchange students between these countries as well as a more understanding economic policy on the part of Washington. We discussed the peculiar moralistic twist in the American people when they refer to the rest of the world and Soviet foreign policy. The delegates were in agreement that their self-righteous ideas as to their American way of life being the best way of life for all the world were quite erroneous. They agreed that the American government would have to make better use of propaganda in many of the countries of the world and that the prime purpose of American policy in these countries should be to help the countries to help themselves.

The delegates could see that the American government had no recourse but to continue the Arms Race until some type of agreement and trust can be formulated with the U.S.S.R. It is interesting to note in passing, the number of times the expression "We are at war now" was heard throughout the discussion period.

Our Readers Write:

Kacophalesky

Dear Sir:

Obviously the January 9th "Potpourri" Review of the T.S.O.'s Subscription Concert was written by one of the intellectual, atonal elite who are striving to divorce music as completely as possible from a public who look for human and spiritual qualities in their music. It is truly unfortunate that in his symphony Kabalevsky did not provide the type of contrapuntal acrobatics and restrained desecration which the reviewer was seeking.

As a member of the merely emotional bourgeoisie, I was swept to the heights of Kabalevsky's glorious declamations in the third movement and charmed by the honest folk-like melodies which gave a humble truth to the whole work. Here was vital, energetic, moving composition! At this performance, I was with three friends who are sympathetic to the voice of music, but attest to no particular theoretical erudition. To them, most modern music seems pointless, digressive, and hopelessly unintelligible; but Kabalevsky's Second Symphony spoke to them and they listened to its argument.

Perhaps the Western world should examine its spiritual existence more closely when modern Russian Communism can produce such a piece of virulent, expressive, and humanistic music to match our aimless cacophony. JOE WEARING (SGS).

Kind Castro

Dear Sir,

I read with great interest the recent editorial condemning executions by Cuban rebel leader Fidel Castro. This condemnation is far from unpopular in Canada and the United States at the moment and it is not doing us any good as far as I can see.

To start with, criticism of atrocities in Cuba must, to those concerned, seem to be coming a little late. Canadian-American condemnation of rather more sophisticated manifestations of man's inhumanity to man under the Batista regime seem to have taken mainly the form of large arms shipments to the Batista government.

Castro has estimated that the executions of Cuban government supporters will not number more than about 400. He has said that only the perpetrators of torture and gratuitous brutality will die. He has said only those are dying who have been responsible for more than 12 deaths themselves.

He may be lying in his teeth in any of these statements or in all of them. He may be lying when he says all those executed have been tried. But we have no evidence that he is.

The justice of the Castro regime may be summary and it may be harsh. But the analogy Castro draws with the Nuremberg war trials may not be an invalid one.

This revolution, if indeed it is such and not just a change of oligarchies, is the very sort of thing which one expects to end in reprisals of such a nature. Nuremberg is not so much. A war between sovereign states has a few lingering traditions of honor whereas a revolution has traditions only of bloodshed.

Compared to Russian revolutionary executions or the French terror, the Cuban executions seem almost incredibly mild — so far.

In the field of Latin American politics, any hasty judgment is very likely to be wrong. Outright and wholehearted approval of Castro in the beginning was perhaps hasty, but so is outright and inevitably uninformed damnation of him now.

The animosity of a people seems a heavy price to pay for the luxury of a pious judgment on a question which history may well answer in Castro's favor.

a little touch of Nimchuk in the night

Somebody who saw the second and final performance of Michael John Nimchuk's "The Girl in the Black Bathing Suit" Friday, had this to say about it: "For a nothing performance, of a nothing play about nothing people, it wasn't bad."

On the surface, this seems like a fairly accurate estimate. However, if it was really this bad, there is no point in saying anything more. It seems to me there is something more to be said about the play.

First of all, the UC Players' Guild production was certainly not impressive and may have done much to spoil an original play that was better than it appeared on stage. Skimpily sets, not skimpy enough to be symbolically suggestive of anything and not complete enough to create a genuine mood had something to do with it. Mediocre acting generally had more to do with it. Only Judith Orban seemed up to really portraying anything, and George Appleby who had one of the two central roles was completely dismal.

"The Girl in the Black Bathing Suit" deals frankly and without embroidery with Toronto and Torontonians caught in a universal predicament. Vince (George Appleby), an unoriginal person with no particular ambition except to get a law degree after failing his year several times, loves Barbara (Judith Orban) who wants desperately to escape the ponderous monotony of Toronto and, as she puts it, "have a ball." "I want much more (in life) than the stinking old KCR," she explains. As such, Barbara cannot possibly accept Vince, set as he is on a complacent Toronto existence.

This, then, is the conflict. In terms of plot, the play goes like this: nostalgic and despondent, Vince is recalling for a friend the last time he saw Barbara on the beach at Toronto Island.

A flashback sequence portrays Barbara as she was then, moody, despising Toronto, mocking Vince. Coming out of his reverie, Vince is dragged out by his roommate for a drink. The pair run into Barbara in a bar, now married, five years older and miserable. Vince and Barbara talk. Everything is the same with small changes: Barbara has married badly to an alcoholic drifter, Vince now radiates with the holy glow of determination to get his degree and live his humdrum life. Both of them, for different reasons, are utterly trapped by the tedious life the play portrays.

Such is the not very exciting situation. Despite all this, something emerges that is worth noticing.

The only real dramatic moment in the play comes when Barbara breaks down and as much as admits to Vince that she is trapped. There is real sorrow here and the prosaic quality of the play is suddenly explained. In Barbara's despair, a whole universe of boredom is suddenly concentrated and understood. What is really remarkable beyond this is that not only most of the players, but the playwright himself seems to have felt this and bent every effort to making the play as dull and devoid of emotion as possible. That all this must be done to achieve a sense of totally frustrating boredom seems a high price to pay in terms of art, and its, perhaps, indicative of the Toronto predicament.

UC Gargoyle — Poetry Edition

Last year the University College Gargoyle published a poetry page in one of its spring issues. This year that page has become "The Annual Poetry Edition"—a booklet of twenty-six small pages—edited by John Robert Colombo. It marks the advent of another outlet for student writing on this campus.

Mr. Colombo has long been advocating the multiplication of such publications, and this collection of poetry is the best argument he could have come up with.

The species of poet generally found in and around a university usually discovers that, in Augustine's phrase, our virtues are our vices. He knows what is "clever" and what is "good" and what "form" is, and he is very concerned to see that they get into his own verse. Too often the result is a cluster of "brilliant" strokes rather improbably thrust upon some unsuspecting subject matter, which cannot stand up under them. The poet has forgotten that his business is to discover and elucidate a form within his subject matter, not to impose on it something alien from the outside. When this tendency is overcome, what ensues is worthwhile poetry. And the present publication is a case in point.

It is true that in it one will find phrases, a bit too slick, bewilderingly aloof within an otherwise serious attempt to deal with some subject matter. But they stand out precisely because they are out of keeping with the drift of the volume as a whole. The same is true of most of the faults we can find. Perhaps Harvey Shepherd uses a diction that is too eruditely fashionable in verse; or Sam Ajzenstat capitalises too much on the modern poet's license for obscurity. Perhaps John Smith's metaphors are too tightly packed to be easily untangled. But Shepherd uses that diction to balance some delightfully conceived oppositions; Ajzenstat captures our attention with lines that are powerful in sound and startling image; and Smith sins because he is trying to be true to the complexity of his subject. The flaws are significant precisely because of the worth of the poems in which they are found.

Each poet in the collection has set himself a job to do in verse, and the result is usually first rate poetry. Colombo studies the landscape of the psyche, in metaphors that are both careful and reckless. Gerry Vise investigates the macabre aspects of the Christ symbol in a ballad form that is skilful and apt. Bill Van Hoek fashions delicate love poetry out of Biblical imagery. (It is refreshing to find that something besides the Canticle of Canticles has been discovered in the Bible). Christopher Priestly attempts to draw out of external shape the emotional and human significance of situations, and succeeds splendidly. His Sonnet is among the finest thing I have read in publications of this sort.

Of the rest, all of whom ought to be mentioned, one cannot possibly be overlooked, and that is Ed Lacey. In Memoriam is a marvelous piece of wit, with a sardonic undertone that explodes at the end. And Incident, a carefully constructed bit of magic, is the finest poem in the volume which in this reviewer's opinion is no mild praise.

In short, the Annual Poetry Edition is a highly successful venture, one which we hope will be appreciated now, and continued in the future.

Children Of Darkness

When Edwin Justus Mayer's "Children Of Darkness" opened in New York in 1930, the usually acid-tongued George Jean Nathan said of it: "A welcome relief from most of the drip that the stage has been disgorging this season. It has dignity; it has language; and it aims at something higher than the level of the box office till—The exhibit as a whole may be recommended to anyone whose ear is tickled by a skilful and fanciful pen." And yet, it was a disastrous financial flop. The reason? The movies, now that sound had arrived, were drawing larger and larger audiences and inundating them with language at the level of second-rate comic books.

"Children Of Darkness" was years ahead of its time, a fact that was proved by its recent off-Broadway run of over a year, ending just little more than a month ago. This time, audiences now perhaps weary of the stale dialogue to be found on television, awarded the play its just due.

Robert Gili has selected this play for his next Hart House Theatre Production, starting this Saturday, January 24, at 8.30 p.m.; the cast includes Mary Anderson, Norman Edmondson and Garrick Hagon.

For those who appreciate sharp, incisive dialogue, beautifully delineated characterizations, and an intense, exciting plot, "Children Of Darkness" should prove one of the most refreshing theatrical experiences this season.

UN Club Meeting To Probe Education

University of Toronto students who have strong views concerning education and discipline will have a chance to express them tomorrow at a special meeting of the United Nations Club.

Professor A. J. Coleman of the U of T Mathematics Department will lead a discussion of "Education and Discipline", expected to probe the problems of the education system as a whole.

"This will be an informal discussion of the values of Western civilization, whether we are soft in this respect, and if so, how this is reflected on education," Prof. Coleman said last night. "We will try to find how we can help."

He has some views of his own regarding education problems. Prof. Coleman is in favor of "streaming". This is a system whereby students at the Grade IX or X level are divided into sections according to their abilities.

One "stream" takes an extra subject, while another group may finish four years of school in three.

"This system meets the disadvantage of the bright student not having anything to do. It gives him something to chew on, keeps him occupied, and builds his intellect at the same time," said Prof. Coleman.

Bill Ede (II SPS) of the UN club invites foreign students to attend the meeting. "They will have some basis of comparison with another system," he said last night.

The meeting is Tuesday, Jan. 20, at 4 p.m. in room 33, University College. Discussion may be continued on Sunday, Jan. 25. Those who are unable to attend on Tuesday may contact Bill Ede at WA 2-7669, concerning the Sunday meeting.

Hold Giant Debate Here

The U of T Debating Union has set the wheels in motion for its second annual parliamentary-style debating tournament, to be held here Feb. 6 and 7.

Twenty American and 10 Canadian universities have been invited to compete for the John T. Bassett Memorial Trophy, last year carried off by Washington D.C.'s Catholic University of America.

The first five debates, UTDU chairman Ken Wyman has announced, will be conducted along "parliamentary lines, adapted to a small audience."

The final debate, between the top affirmative and negative teams, will take place before a "large audience" of debaters and others interested.

The debaters will be feted at a civic luncheon, a party and a banquet.

Topic for debate is: "That Canada Should Withdraw from NORAD and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization as it is Now Constituted."

"Whassa Matter With Old McGill?"

Blues Flaunt Power Wallop Redmen 14-3

By GENE GLISKY
Associate Sports Editor

Unleashing a torrent of scoring power, Varsity Blues averaged a goal for every four minutes of play to wallop the hapless McGill Redmen 14-3 at the Arena Friday night.

Varsity's smooth, speedy, port winger Grant Mills opened scoring at 25 seconds of the first period to begin the trouncing. Mills playing a whale of a game throughout, garnered three goals and two assists in the contest. The Mills — Mike Elik — John Macdonald contingent picked up 12 points in the game, accounting for six of the Blues' goals.

Blues led 3-0 at the end of the first period, stretched it to 8-2 at the end of the second, and pounded in six more in the third frame.

Redmen managed two goals in the second period. Des Killen scored their first from Steve Molson and Mike Richards, while portly Ivan Saunders connected from Terry O'Connor.

McGill squeaked two shots at Blues' Ray Dunn in the final stanza. Killen again scoring from Molson at 1:11 of the period.

Dunn could have traded his goal stick in on a banjo, or proceeded to catch up on his reading for the rest of the game. No more rubber was piled at him, nor was the smoothness of the ice much disturbed in the Varsity zone.

Three thousand fans gleefully anticipated every Varsity score, as the Blue machine skated circles about McGill.

Several puzzled hoots were heard when Varsity penalties were handed out for bodychecking. This phenomenon is compliments of international rules, whereupon kid glove tactics only are allowed in the opponent's area.

Gloom pervaded Blues' dressing room before the third period, despite the score. It was discovered that starry defenseman Harry Neale would not be dressed for the remainder of the game.

It was feared Neale had suffered a wrist fracture. Later reports, however, confirmed that it is a bad sprain, and Jovial Harry should be back in action when Blues take to the road Jan. 23.

Doug Williams' performance with the Kid-line was wonderful to watch. The crafty centre worked very well with linemates Jim Brooks and Howie (Lil') Bar, Roth, assisting on all but one of his cohorts' scoring plays.

The team play, so typical of Blues, was really exhibited by the big line of Bill (Bear) Kennedy, Dunc (Nails) Brodie, and Ron Casey. The trio performed as a polished unit, passing the puck in dazzling fashion.

After this performance, any doubts regarding Varsity's ability to retain the Queen's cup were quickly dispelled. Laval just managed to squeeze past Montreal, 7-6 in other intercollegiate action.

It was great to see so many fans at the game.

McGill Cagers Fall To Powerful Blues By 59-42 Margin

University of Toronto basketball Blues opened their intercollegiate season Saturday night with a decisive, 59-42, win over a pathetically weak McGill University team.

The Blues, who were almost winless in pre-season play, got off to a fine start in the regular schedule. Their next game is against Rochester Tech in exhibition play Wednesday night.

Saturday's game was dull, as Blues jumped to a quick lead, and the Redmen, playing without star Herman Zloklikovits, never threatened.

Peter Potter led the Varsity scoring parade, pumping in 21 points, but it was Jimmy Maguire and Curt Russell's rebounding that enabled Blues to maintain their lead.

The McGill crew has not yet won a game in their young schedule, so there wasn't too much rejoicing in the Varsity dressing room after the game.

Visions of a powerful University of Western Ontario club are keeping Blues' coach Johnny McManus awake nights, and the strain seems to have taken its toll.

The lineup changes that were made Saturday night bewildered most of the fans, and word has it that a great many people are trying to determine what happened down south.

The Blues have a long and difficult road ahead of them, and it is expected both coach and players will settle down and perform the job of which they are capable.

The bright light on Saturday was probably the return to the lineup of John Dacyshyn after sitting out the southern trip because of a leg injury.

Even though big John didn't play much, a great deal of the team's future success depends on him.

Except for Potter, the Blues' scoring was fairly evenly divided.

Joe Stulac hit for 11 points with his long set shot, and Maguire contributed 10. For McGill, John Finch netted 13 points to be their top scorer.

In the preliminary, Graeme McKee and Paul Scafer netted 18 and 17, respectively, to lead Varsity Baby Blues to a 77-58 decision over Andy's Athletic Club Juniors.

McGill Expels Athlete Poirier

Joe Poirier, 21-year old McGill University football and hockey player, was expelled from that institution at Christmas, a reliable Montreal source told The Varsity Friday.

Poirier apparently fell behind in his studies in the second year of a course in Social Work, the report stated.

The six-foot, 185-pound native of Verdun, Que., was an outstanding offensive end with the McGill football team, with whom he played for two seasons.

Property of the Vancouver Lions, of the Western Interprovincial Football Union, he was regarded as one of the best pass receivers in the Intercollegiate league.

In hockey, he played the first three league games with the Redmen, scoring one goal.

Poirier first caught the eye of professional football scouts in 1955, when he led Notre Dame de Grace Maple Leafs to the Canadian junior football title. He was the leading scorer.

He attended Lions' training camp in the summer of 1957, but returned to McGill to continue his studies and was selected to the all-star team.

Education Essential Soviet Education Explained

CALGARY (CUP) — Essential for continued survival and development in the space age is the training of the mind, says Dr. Claude Bissell, president of the University of Toronto.

Dr. Bissell was addressing the University of Toronto Alumni Association of Calgary, his fourth stop in a nation-wide speaking tour.

Universities are now being accepted as an integral part of the community, he said. The threat of Russia has contributed to the placing of education in a more important light, he continued.

Professors in Russia receive greater social prestige than those in Canada, Dr. Bissell said.

"Canada will not change too much in the next 25 years. It has already made the change from agriculture to urban." The next step will be an intensification of this movement, he said.

Dr. Bissell left for the coast yesterday.

Traveller To Speak

A recent traveller in Communist China will be the guest speaker at a special meeting of the External Affairs Commission of the Students' Administrative Council.

Mr. James Service is a Toronto lawyer involved in municipal politics. He spent 16 days in Communist China last summer with a group of Toronto lawyers. They were the guests of the Chinese Association of Science and Law.

"I will discuss the dynamic growth in such fields as housing and industrial development in Communist China, and the present political and religious freedom there," Mr. Service said last night.

Mr. Service also expects there will be a discussion of the question of recognition of the government of Communist China by the Western powers.

The meeting is at 7.30 p.m. in Falconer Hall.

compulsory system of education, and even by 1955, many outlying districts had no educational program, he said.

In order to speed up the full program, the 10-year curriculum was dropped and an eight-year one was adopted; but it was still a European system.

"Do the Canadians," he asked, "think themselves so stupid that they cannot learn more in 13 years than the Russians do in eight?"

"The Soviets are attempting to handle human brains as raw material in a shock technique of education," Dr. Szenci added. "This is psychological, but certainly not logical."

"In looking at the Soviet system of education, the West has forgotten to look at the 100,000,000 people between the Baltic and the Black Sea," he continued, citing his own country, Hungary.

The technique is the same as in Russia, he said. Teaching the humanities was stopped, and the professors were fired.

Dr. Szenci was Professor of political science at the University of Sopron before the Communists took over.

The sciences were not touched, except to indoctrinate the professors involved to incorporate Marxism into their courses.

"The government had to take over education out of necessity," he said. "With the academic year lasting from September to June and military service in the summer, the students only had two weeks free. This was not enough time to work one's way through college," he said.

Dr. Szenci ended by describing some aspects of life under the Communist regime in Hungary.

"Children grow up fast," he said, "because they soon realize the dangers they are facing. They soon discover the true nature of secret police 'school inspectors' who ask them about their parents' beliefs; few parents are betrayed."

People in the cities always go to churches in another district so that the secret policeman assigned to the church will not recognize them, he added.

Dr. Szenci escaped during the revolution two years ago, and is now working at the U of T Registrar's office.

Train for THE BEST OF TWO WORLDS TOMORROW

Develop your leadership ability, acquire new technical skills, benefit financially and continue your university courses by enrolling in the tri-service Regular Officer Training Plan (ROTP). It provides for:

- university tuition fees paid by the Department of National Defence
- a monthly salary
- allowances for board and room, books and instruments
- free medical and dental care

Then, on graduating, you will have not only your chosen professional training, but also the prestige of the Queen's Commission as an officer — with the many personal advantages it brings.

University students accepted for ROTP are trained as career officers. However, provision is made for voluntary withdrawal upon completion of three years full duty as a commissioned officer.

Prof wants anger

When is student a bucket?

The University of Toronto has no angry young men, Dr. A. J. Coleman of the Mathematics Department told students yesterday.

Speaking at a meeting of the United Nations Club, on "Discipline in Education," Dr. Coleman said, "students fail to be stimulated into anger by their teachers' remarks."

"There are too many lectures at this university. Too many professors are under the impression students are inert buckets into which knowledge is to be poured. Too often the gold that falls from a professor's lips solidifies in the bucket," said Dr. Coleman.

Dr. Coleman emphasized the problem of the gifted child. "The majority of bright students are not challenged at depth when they are in high school, and their minds tend to degenerate during the years they are at university," he said.

He said the student of today has too many opportunities to dissipate his energies. In the words of T. S. Eliot, he seems "distracted from distraction by distraction."

Dr. Coleman said, "the student must learn self-discipline. There is no real freedom without it."

Concerning the U of T Advisory Committee Report on Student Aid, he said, "one of its best recommendations will change the school year so it approaches the term system of Oxford and Cambridge."

It will be in the holidays that the student will do his real thinking. He will assimilate and mull over the material acquired during the term. Dr. Coleman referred to this as his system of "Meditative Assimilation."

"The whole purpose of the plan is to turn the student from 'passive absorption' to 'active learning,'" said Dr. Coleman.

Caput Meeting Coming

The U of T's supreme disciplinary body, the Caput, meets Thursday to consider the case of 16 Architecture students who allegedly removed the remains of an Engineering Society Christmas tree already topped by another group Dec. 17, assistant registrar R. Ross said last night.

A caput subcommittee has been formed under the chairmanship of Dentistry Dean R.G. Ellis to investigate the relationship between fraternities and the U of T Mr. Ross said. The committee will commence deliberations Feb. 9.

The five-man group, members of Delta Tau Delta fraternity, who topped the tree were fined $50 each Jan. 10 and suspended from university office until the end of the 1959-60 academic session.

In a statement following the Jan. 10 meeting, the Caput said evidence had been "brought to suggest that the remainder of the tree, together with the decorations... had been removed by a group of other students... to their Fraternity House."

Red Chinese Industry Like West's - Lawyer

A prominent Toronto lawyer last night walloped Canada for its failure to recognize Communist China.

Speaking to about 40 U of T students in Falconer Hall, James Service blamed the failure on the "frozen terror of the Canadian government at the result of possible United States reaction."

Service said the number-one reason for U.S. refusal to admit Red China into the United Nations is American fear "their prestige as an anti-Communist power will be diminished."

Back from a trip to Red China, Service said the most startling feature of the country is not Communism but "surging nationalism."

"Although the Chinese nation constantly blasts Great Britain and the U.S. as ineffective capitalist powers they want to imitate them in industrial projects, not Russia," he said.

The many religions in the country have not been openly persecuted, he said, "because inherent Communist belief in the social structure of their state, leads them to predict any form of religion will be crushed in time."

Service called Chinese utilization of Communism the "most clever" of any in the world. "China has capitalized on mistakes of the Russians and is fast moving towards a future date with greatness."

At the present Red China wants recognition from the West more than anything else, he said.

"The wedge which the U.S. has driven between China and the West is the basic reason for pronounced Chinese leanings towards Russia," he added.

The lawyer said Chinese leaders have, on the surface, allowed intellectuals a certain amount of influence in the country, but without giving them any power.

One of the prime aims of Chinese economic policy is to overtake Great Britain in industrial capacity within the next 15 years, he said.

Service mentioned revolutions in language, construction and industry as the most important factors in pushing the Chinese along the road to their goal of "ultimate Socialism."

Jargon on Trial:

Future Only Fair

Outlook for "Jargon," the university literary magazine, is "fairer, but still not favorable," editor John Robert Colombo said last night.

Contributions indicate the magazine is "still going to be an all-Arts review," Colombo said.

"The Students' Administrative Council would seriously consider not publishing the magazine if the literary quality is not high enough," he said. "Last year was a pilot year, but this year must be fruitful or else."

So far Colombo has only 13 contributions along with several "good promises." Deadline for submissions is Feb. 1.

Colombo said he hoped he would not be forced to use more than 20 per cent reprint material in the magazine.

Colombo stressed the need for contributions from non-Arts faculties. "This year's issue will definitely prove whether there is good writing in these faculties," he said.

Colombo stressed that "Jargon" is not "an artsy-crafty magazine" and said almost all the faculties would be contributing specific amounts of money to the magazine, totalling a $900 investment.

"SPS refused to contribute $25," he said. "I don't know why."

Entries should be given to Students' Administrative Council representatives, or to the editor at 73 St. George St.

Law Switch Puts Debates Union In

An exhausted St. Michael's College student council last night amended its constitution to allow recognition of a new debating union as the college's official debating voice outside SMC.

The five-hour SMC Students' Administrative Council meeting approved the charter of a new SMC Debating Union representing a federation of the male Senate Club and the female Forensic Circle which otherwise remain separate entities.

The mixed Oratorical Society was invited to join the Union as soon as possible.

The battle culminated with a statement by second-year student Peter Dembski that he would resign as Oratorical Society president within a week.

He said the SAC "substituted efficiency for ideals. I hope this isn't true of the college or Christianity at large."

The amendment changed a clause of the SAC constitution previously prohibiting the duplication of an already-existing organization. The Union had been previously prohibited under this clause.

SMC SAC president Mike McCabe said Dembski owed it to the Orators to stay as their president until an Orator-Union federation was effected.

Dembski also was narrowly defeated in an election for second-year SAC representative.

A statement by Francis Gremse, Oratorical Society vice-president, said, "the Oratorical Society suffered an overwhelming defeat both in its present operation and past history since the amended constitution was the brainchild of a past president of the Oratorical Society."

The Debating Union will be governed by representatives from all its member societies, according to its charter, and will assign debaters to off-campus debate invitations without prejudice to any member society.

Present obligations of member societies are not affected by the federation.

Dembski said the Orators lose the right to represent the college outside SMC by the move.

Many members present said the tide of battle seemed to turn against the Orators after a short recess which was followed by the amendment.

Elected second-year representative at the meeting was second-year student Paul Foley.

Theologian's Philosophy Outlined By Lecturer

For the German-American theologian Paul Tillich, Christian philosophy is "the theology" a Trinity professor told a Student Christian Movement lecture audience yesterday.

Rev. E.R. Fairweather was quoting from Tillich's "Systematic Theology" in the first of a lecture series called "Prophetic Profiles". About 200 students attended.

Born in 1886 in Germany, Tillich was ordained in the Lutheran church in 1912 and served as a German army chaplain in World War I. Expelled from a Frankfurt University post by Hitler, Tillich came to the United States in 1933. He is now a Harvard University professor.

Prof. Fairweather said Tillich considers all religious theologies other than the Christian lacking either universality or concreteness. Theology for Tillich should investigate the ultimate concern of man: that of "being" or "not being."

According to Tillich, the professor said, theology and philosophy are inseparable because they deal essentially with this same problem: that of "being". Their respective approaches to the question are different.

Whereas philosophy searches for structural interpretation of "being", theology approaches this question in search of meaning, the lecture continued.

Group Of Five Is No More Founder Retiring, Discouraged

Dark, brooding Ladd Vormitag, SGS, founder and president of the U of T's controversial Group of Five last night told The Varsity his cause, espoused only a few months ago for the first time, is "in the grips of a decay imposed by the narrowness of contemporary man."

"There is a shocking lack of initiative in this world of ours," he reflected, "It used to be a man could create almost anything he believed in. Now forces of prejudice and ignorance nip every promising flower of creativity in its spiritual bud."

"The Greeks were right," he added, "I wish I was dead."

He explained that the dissolution of his club came about when a member's proposal that a petition for free love be forwarded to the university residence authorities was voted down by the club.

"This was the last straw for me," Vormitag said.

He said the next two weeks would see his retirement from public life on campus and hinted he may spend the time living in a tent on Toronto Island.

"If there is any sign after that of renewed interest in the club, I may resume the presidency," he said.

Many Flunk At UNB

FREDERICTON — CUP — Illiteracy and unprepared work have been given as the main reasons for a high failure rate of freshman students in University of New Brunswick exams.

Professors from arts and science faculties have been asked for their views on the high failure rates. As many as 70 per cent failed in some courses.

History professor Dr. J.K. Chapman said "many students failed to apply themselves to the course and some are definitely not college material." There was a 50 per cent failure rate in Prof. Chapman's course.

An English professor has laid the blame on an under-par freshman class and says there is a high degree of illiteracy in the papers.

High participation in extra-curricular activities on the part of freshmen was given as an additional reason for the failures.

Amend Constitution After Lit Struggle For Quorum

After a desperate search to round up enough University College students to make up a voting quorum, a UC Literary and Athletic Society open meeting yesterday managed to push through two constitutional amendments.

One changes the ballot for Lit presidential elections to a simple one-vote basis in certain cases. The previous ballot called for names to be marked in order of preference.

The other amendment plugged a loophole in campaign-expense regulations for candidates for Lit office. Lit president Bill Davis said.

The ballot change was made because of complications resulting from the fact that the Lit president and vice-president are of different sexes, but are elected from the same list, Davis said.

Order-of-preference ballots will continue to be used for elections to posts other than president and vice-president, and for those positions when there are at least two candidates of each sex.

The expense regulation limits a candidate's campaign expenses to $10. Previously, only his personal contribution was affected by the limit, Davis said.

Also introduced was a by-law allowing the president to appoint a chairman for open meetings the honorary president cannot attend.

Lit secretary Linda Bansk had to be sent out about 15 minutes before the end of the one-hour noon meeting to round up two students to make up the 50-man quorum. Previously, Davis had limited the meeting to routine reports and discussion.

This was the last of several such excursions.

human element

We have heard some grumbings recently about Hart House and its administration. In a way we welcome these grumbings. In the first place they are the sort of grumbings people make about an institution they think is almost perfect but only wish they could make it a bit more perfect.

In the second place it gives us a chance to say something about Hart House and its administration which we think should be said and at the same time to correct and apologize for a widely misunderstood reference by the infamous Champus Cat in the Christmas issue of The Varsity.

Hart House, as a students' union is unique to North American universities. A few students' unions in European universities operate on much the same principle, but nowhere would you find the combination of activity and relaxation, opportunity and inspiration which is provided a U of T student by Hart House.

Where other students' unions on this continent are merely a collection of common-rooms and a cafeteria, some furnished lavishly, most based on utilitarian designs, we have always imagined Hart House as a compact, complete city-in-itself. It offers everything from orchestras to oratory, from dramatics to dancing, and a thousand and one things in between.

Hart House administration is virtually autonomous and largely student run. Later this term student elections will be held for positions on the Board of Stewards and on various committees. On a higher plane there are permanent positions occupied by men experienced in their individual fields and with strong educational interests.

Watching over all this, and again in a position unique to North American universities, is the Warden. There can perhaps be no higher praise of Joseph McCulley than the fact that we find it completely unnecessary to talk about him as an individual. In fact it would be presumptuous of us to do so. Everybody who knows him — and there are very few male students who don't — understands what we mean.

But we will presume to talk for a minute about the office of Warden itself, because on other campuses in this country such a position is almost incomprehensible. It is not a position which is easy to fill. It takes a great deal of patience and a great deal of sincerity. Hart House will welcome Prime Ministers and paupers and the Warden will play host to them all.

The Warden of Hart House must be both a patron of the Arts and a master of debate, he must be a diplomat and a psychologist, a philosopher and an advisor; and on top of all this, he must still possess the organizational capacity to see that all runs smoothly throughout the most complex institution in this university.

Warden McCulley, like his predecessors, has no doubts about his position and the difficulties it presents. Students, however, tend to forget these things. Often cynical, usually selfish, they think it fashionable to look gift horses in the mouth and groan about what they see.

People who grumble about Hart House and its Warden should first realize that without them, the University of Toronto would be a mechanical feudal system without its finest and most human estate.

My Country

My country is a song,
Which floods with every breath upon my lips
And swells my lungs with long awaited joy.
My country peaks with cosmic light upon my brain
And wakes me with a brilliant sense of life.
My country's name threads out the pattern of my feet
And in a surging crest dissolves the walls of discontent.

My country, undistinguishes from my God
Is all embracing of my worlds, and very soul.
Oh Canada, my country, my very own!
Strong boned, defined by borders,
But in my soul — defying walls.

A Question of Taste

Cat drags in some minor beefs

Penitent and ashamed, the cat has finally been released from his punishment cage and once again is free to roam the university grounds and to report back what he finds. Concentrating on things rather than people, the cat has dragged in a list of minor grievances which, he says, irk students unnecessarily. The list is not a long one. In many ways it is a facetious one, because the wise old cat has tramped his beat now for 30 years and he knows that authority always has a ready answer for its own shortcomings. Sometimes, however, authority rouses itself from its complacency. It is in this vague hope that the cat asks:

—Why the Hart House Committee doesn't take a somewhat realistic approach and call the Arbor Room painting "Picture of the Month":

—Why the Library doesn't be equally realistic and admit first and second year students to the stacks because we are sick of lending our ATL cards:

—Why the wonderful new bookstore insists that students pay for books on one side of the room and for stationery on the other:

—Why in fact the bookstore can't go all the way and sell cokes and donuts, aspirins and razor blades, instead of just cigarets and magazines:

—Why in the name of architectural sanity we are forced to look at UC bathed in a hideous orange glow at night as well as in the day, and why we are forced to do so at the cost of hundreds of dollars:

—Why the library cannot provide ashtrays in its smoking room:

—Why somebody doesn't ask the city to construct a couple of dry, paved walks across Queen's Park:

—Why students have no sense of tradition and blunder blatantly through the kissing arch while more noble couples are taking advantage of an age old custom:

—Why ignorant asses treat Soldier's Tower with such irreverence by cluttering it up with motorcycles:

—Why, for the 500th time and since there is no mention of alcohol in the U of T Act, we can't have a campus pub and use the profits to further expansion of the university instead of throwing it away on the Park Plaza:

—Why the U of T Press has become so proud of itself and takes so long and asks so much to do any job:

—Why the Student's Directory can't appear sometime before January and why it can't be included in every student's incidental costs:

—Why there are really no big grievances to fight against any more.

The ARTS

Seldom does a book or a discussion of Canadian culture combine in the way this one does the qualities of authoritative knowledge and expert criticism. In the sixteen articles and over one hundred illustrations in The Arts in Canada no cultural activity on the Canadian scene, with the exception of amateur theatre, interior decoration and art education, remains unexamined. As the sub-title of the work indicates, ('Stock-taking at Mid-century'), it is not a catalogue, nor an exercise in national self-congratulation. Its writers were chosen for their familiarity with their subject, for their concern for a truly national expression of a characteristic Canadian outlook, and for their critical ability, insight and foresight; they were not chosen for their adherence to a single point of view. They do not even agree as to what constitutes art let alone art which is Canadian; but they all agree that 'A stock-taking at mid-century' is certainly in order.

The result is a book in which two characteristics of Canadian art in general clearly emerge: discovery and assimilation, traditionalism and experimentalism, a deeply-rooted sense of debt to the past and a bold and youthful investment in the future. The search for new patterns, for promising elements, for increased activity provides lively, stimulating and interesting reading for any Canadian, who is concerned for the future of Canadian art and, by implication, for Canadian civilization.

A solemn warning is issued again and again throughout the book that the process of assimilation of our many cultural and racial traditions must continue and must go deeper; and that the Canadian listening, reading and viewing public must become more intelligent and interested critics than they have been in the past, if Canadian art is to progress and expand to the point of being a really powerful force in our national life, and a source of pride in its impact on the international cultural scene. The warning, and the challenge it contains, alone make this a book which every Canadian, who is at all conscious of the power of art, should want to read, if not to own.

Blobs and Blotches by Bush

We have come quite a way since the days when abstract artists were compared to monkeys that had accidentally spilled a can of paint on a piece of canvas. We have to a great extent come to realize that far from allowing him to put something over on the public, the demands of abstract art make it almost impossible for the inferior artist to fool anyone. A representational painter, if his talent fails him, can fall back on the charm or inherent significance of his subject, but the abstract artist has nothing but his ability. Any charm or significance in an abstract painting must derive from the artist. To a great artist, these heavy demands are the triumph of abstract art. To Jack Bush, currently exhibiting at the Park Gallery they are more like an occupational hazard.

Jack Bush is a member of Painter's Eleven. I believe this is his first one-man show. A good many of the canvases in it remind us all over again of the monkey and the can of paint, in that they resemble unhappy accidents. So few of them seem to have a mind, thinking or feeling behind them. Typical of these is a very large canvas consisting entirely of glaringly bright splotches of paint gratuitously laid down on a white background. There seems to be no tension or interplay of any kind between the splotches. In fact the painting seems to express nothing Pianist, Patricia Parr, was guest recitalist at the first of the new year's Sunday evening concerts in the Great Hall. Well-known to Toronto audiences, Miss Parr played a sketchy programme of Scarlatti, Schumann, Bloch and Chopin.

The programme opened promisingly with the exquisite "Cortege" sonata in E major. Here was delicacy and subtle nuance, but uncontrolled nerves tended to mar the exacting Scarlatti articulation in the whimsical B minor sonata which followed.

This quiet introduction led to the main work on the programme, the Schumann Symphonic Etudes: twelve more or less free variations on a sustained theme in C sharp minor. A kaleidoscope of ghostly and elfin dances, love songs, martial strains and polyphonic tours de force, this work is the most brilliant of Schumann's piano writing of permanent value. Miss Parr handled it capably, but not always authoritatively. The imposed lyricism of the second variation was lost in accompaniment and she was not happy with the leaps. But by the sixth etude Miss Parr seemed to get a hold over herself. The 7th and diabolical, scherzo-like 9th were most convincing. In the murmuring 11th variation, however, the melodic lines were sometimes not well shaped. The last variation was powerful and exciting dramatically; but dotted rhythmic patterns were obscured by over-peddalling and the resonance of the Hall. There was a good sense of climax at recurring entrances of the opening theme of this magnificent rondo-finale.

Miss Parr's best playing was that of the Poems of the Sea, an impressionistic suite of three pieces by Ernest Bloch. Some lively pianissimos characterized the Chanty, which was quite reminiscent of MacDowell. The intricate, dance-like rhythms and motifs were handled deftly in the concluding "At Sea".

A Chopin waltz brought the recital to a close. The familiar E minor waltz was rather square, and though the opening theme was light and graceful, the brilliant coda was inaccurately unsuccessful. Beautiful tone pointing in the C sharp minor nocturne proved that Miss Parr could play Chopin. The uneasy hesitant melody over a brooding bass, the dramatic episode building up to its irresistible climax were superb. The return of the opening theme and the coda in the major were poetically breathtaking.

Bill Aide

Sturdily bound, richly illustrated and interestingly written, this book attests to the often unrecognized hunger of Canadians for a culture that is unique and distinctively their own. It can lead to a filling of that hunger by opening to public inspection vast floods and trickling streams of heretofore unknown and unheralded cultural activity, which are right now in peril of sinking away into the sands of public apathy. If it stimulates and informs even one soundly-argued debate in even one home in every subdivision in Toronto, every Canadian artist will find in himself a new vigour and a new eagerness to produce a truly great Canadian culture. This in itself will amply justify the courage and the care which has gone into the writing and the editing of this book.

Cool Collier

Compositional jazz invades Hart House tonight when the Ron Collier Quintet will be in concert at 5 p.m.

The music these men play is something different, and is difficult to describe. It has been termed "many things to many minds" which is the closest we can come.

The music is a new art form combining the best of jazz and classical music, having the freedom and emotion of jazz, and the intellectual complexities of the classics. Although there is little improvisation in the music played by this group, it is played on jazz instruments by jazz musicians. That is why it is jazz. The drive, the spirit which classical music lacks, is present here.

We watched these men rehearse last night at the House of Hamburg, described by its owner as "a spiritual home for creative modern music." They are intensely serious about their work. Watching guitarist Ed Bickert, trombonist Ron Collier and Bernie Pilch, who plays clarinet, alto saxophone or flute, swing through a difficult piece of counterpoint, while Carne Bray and Ron Rully lay down a solid beat, we were immediately impressed by their great technical skill. They are all classically-based musicians.

But at the same time we found our feet following the time — nothing wild about it, no putting your head back and wailing, just a wonderful feeling of participation. We had to pay rapt attention to this music to understand it. Some of it sent our minds into a turmoil, some of it was depressing, some almost licentiously happy. And it was all cool.

Many criticize the lack of improvisation in groups such as this. They criticize the pianoless sound, the lack of vibrato, and the general un-dixie attitude. But they fail to credit the merits of this new sound.

The quintet has toured widely, and was the only Canadian jazz group presented at the 1957 Stratford Music Festival. A series of six concerts was presented to the Canadian public last summer over the C.B.C.

The members of the group are all well-known Toronto musicians, and most of them have been featured on recordings. Ed Bickert and drummer Ron Rully are currently appearing at the Town Tavern in Toronto. Bassist, Carne Bray, is a third year student at University College.

All the music to be presented tonight except for "Autumn Leaves" was written either by Ron Collier or by Norm Synnonds, Toronto composer and arranger.

Wrestling Team Triumphs

Last Saturday night the U of T wrestlers defeated the senior team from the U of Western Ontario 20-19 in an exhibition meet held at London.

Although behind 19-5 in the early going Varsity rallied with three consecutive pins to salvage the honors.

In the system of scoring five points are awarded for a pin and only three for a decision.

Andy Higgins gave Varsity the initial five points by flattening Sam Wade. The score thus remained till Franz Ledvinka, and the Brown brothers, Herb and Frank, took over and scored a comeback victory.

Ledvinka, a European Greco-Roman wrestler, fought his first Canadian match. He impressed everyone by pinning Bob Bailey in the first round.

Both Herb and Frank Brown came through in spectacular fashion. Herb flattened Doug Williamson while Frank pinned all-star gridiron linebacker Bill Mitchell, who held at least a 20 pound weight advantage.

How to do without banks

(in millions of easy steps)

Step one: Simply carry with you all the money you need for immediate purpose . . . tuition, bills, incidental expenses, etc. This keeps your money at everybody's fingertips.

Step two: If you can't spend or lose your money immediately, press it under your mattress. This keeps it crisp and unspoiled . . . none of this mingling with other people's money in a bank earning savings account interest.

Steps three, four, five, six, seven, eight . . . ad infinitum: When you have bills to pay, pay them in person. Why spend 10c for a cheque that you can mail, when you can spend hours trudging around or riding buses or looking for a place to park?

Step Infinity-plus-one: If you have valuable or hard-to-replace papers around, buy a good, sturdy safe. It may cost $500 or so, but you'll save the $5.00 an inexpensive safety deposit box would cost.

P.S. If you don't care to master all these steps, drop in at your nearest BNS branch.

Students are always welcome.

Montreal's Laurendeau Leads Scoring

University of Montreal forward Yves Laurendeau moved into sole possession of first place in the Intercollegiate hockey scoring race with a six-point outburst in Carabins 7-6 loss to Laval Rouge et Or Friday night.

Laurendeau scored three goals but dropped to third, along with Varsity's Bill Kennedy and two Laval players — Lorne Arsenault and Robert Landry. Arsenault leads the league in assists with eight, equalling Laurendeau's pace-setting eight goals.

Raymond collected two points,

Varsity's Grant Mills was the other player to show the most gain on last weekend's play. The little left-winger counted three goals and two assists to move well up the ladder.

McGill's Terry Dingle continued as the league bad man, with a total of 30 minutes in the penalty box. He's trailed by Varsity's Lorry Stacey with 22; and Redman Mike Richards with 20.

In team penalty totals, Blues lead the pack with 83 minutes. McGill is second with 78, trailed by Montreal with 68 and Laval with 62.

Toronto goalie Ray Dunn moved into second place in net-minding records with a 3.83 average. He's tied with Pierre Schooner of Montreal. Varsity's Bob Giroux leads with a 3.00 mark.

Ramblers Ramble 7-2 As Rinkies Outclassed

Lyndhurst Ramblers, of the East Toronto Industrial League, handed Varsity Baby Blues their first defeat of the season Monday night, 7-2, at Varsity Arena.

Baby Blues, whose unbeaten record had included wins over McMaster Marlins and Osgoode Hall, were no match for Joe Kane and his Ramblers.

Lyndhursts grabbed a 2-0 lead in the first seven minutes, surrendered a goal midway through the period, and stretched their lead to 5-1 before Varsity hit the scoresheet again.

Joe Nash was the big gun for the visitors, collecting a goal and four assists. Don Curtis, Roy Calhoun and Ed Rowett each netted a pair for the winners.

Bill Cawkcill and Gord Gow were the Varsity marksmen. Cawkcill's first-period goal was unassisted, while Pete Warren and Jerry Manale gained assists on Gow's marker in the third chukker.

Referees Bill Naylor and Al Fleming handed out seven penalties, five to Jack Wheldrake's Baby Blues. Only one Manale's third, in the last period—figured in the scoring, with Ramblers tallying while Manale was off for charging.

Ice chips: The senior Blues tied Ramblers, 5-5, in their first exhibition game in November... a repeat match now would be no contest... Hoopsters Host Rochester Tech

BY JOHN AND HARRY MUNGE

When Varsity Basketball Blues take to the floor tonight at 8:30 in Hart House, it will be to battle with a powerful team from Rochester Tech.

This is the first American team to brave the perils of the Hart House gym this season. Since it is an established fact that this gym gives Varsity a ten point advantage, this should be a close game.

The defending champions are only tuning up for the week-end clashes, as Varsity once again hits the road on Friday afternoon.

Friday night Blues play Queen's at Kingston, then spend Saturday night in Montreal as guests of McGill Redmen.

The injury bug is plaguing Blues, as last years all-star guard Don Lipke has been forced to the sidelines with an internal injury.

Most of the other regulars are in good enough shape to make the Rochester visit worthwhile.

Peter Potter will team up with veteran Ruby Richman in the back-court positions, while Joe Stulac will also see action.

Rebounding chores will be shared by Jimmy MacGuire, Rollit Goldring, and John Dacysbyn. Curt Russell whose shooting is improving with each game, is another rugged man under the boards.

The preliminary contest, getting under way at 7:00, engages Baby Blues with the lawyers from Osgoode.

PHE Team Girls Archery Winners Skiers, Fencers Plan Activities

The interfaculty archery season drew to a close last Friday when June Seaveur (last year's Intercollegiate champion), with high score of 405 out of a possible 496, teamed with Viliu Kanep to turn in a score of 722 for PHE and a first place. Any faculty could compete by entering a team of two members, each of whom had to shoot a total of nine ends at distances of 15, 20 and 25 yards.

Meds placed second with 484 shot by Jean Hayward and Inara Grava; and Trinity third with 446 by Jo Hurst and 'friend'. There were only two other entrants, both from Keen old PHE. They got 437, and 419. All around, it was a good—and close—competition. Get out and try it next year—you don't even have to have done it before! (believe me! I know!)

Next on the archery agenda is the Intercollegiate meet at OAC on January 31st. June Seaveur, Viliu Kanep, Jean Hayward, and Margaret Merritt (House Ec.) all shot in the outdoor championships, and unless somebody out of the blue challenges them, they'll probably be shooting the indoor championships, too.

While on the subject of archery, the club sponsored a small, informal tournament for six high schools last Saturday morning. Teams of four participated in novelty shoots and what have you, and scores saw Central Commerce first with 964 and Malvern second with 837. June says this was very successful, giving the high schoolers their first introduction to competition, and distance shooting. It is hoped that this will arouse interest, not only back at their schools, but also when they get to College—seems like a good idea.

The hockey season is well under way. Last Friday, St. Hilda's unfortunately snuck one goal past Sharon for a 1-0 win over Pharmacy. In other games: St. Mike's defeated Victoria II 3-1; Victoria I slaughtered poor old U.C. 12-0; Nursing defeated St. Mike's 5-2; and yesterday, Meds defeated P & OT 5-2. Since Pharmacy is idle this week, the game of the week is to-day at noon between St. Hilda's I and U.C. I. Game time is 12:30, so do come and support us, Pharmacy!

The skiing club is having an open meeting to-morrow (Thursday) afternoon at 5:00 o'clock, Falconer Hall. This is to discuss the combined U. of T. women's ski weekend and the Interfaculty meet on February 14th. At this meeting, Helen Weider, Canadian women's skiing champion, will speak briefly, and give a few demonstrations. So... do attend—tomorrow, Falconer, 5:00 p.m.

There have been twelve volleyball games played, but goodness only knows how to get the scores! However, a few reliable sources have turned in the following: in League I: St. Hilda's defeated Victoria II; in League II: Victoria IV defeated St. Hilda's I, dear old Pharmacy managed to defeat St. Mike's, a game between St. Hilda's and St. Mike's was cancelled because of a fencing practice, and after all they were armed with "swords"; in League III: Nursing defeated Victoria I; in League IV: OCE defeated Victoria II, and Victoria II defeated P & OT II. And who cares about all this jabber, anyway?

The fencers seem to be having a bit of trouble. In the first place, they have not heard from McGill about a requested intercollegiate tournament. Secondly, both the Ontario junior ladies foil championship and an invitational meet with the top American teams at Rochester fall on the same date—and they only have about six fencers altogether. However, they are having good practises with some of Mr. Alpar's students at his own studio.

On this note, je finial.

Judo Experts On Show Highlight Athletic Night

For the past year there has been an increasing display of enthusiasm for the sport of Judo at the University of Toronto.

In 1957 Mr. Tommy Hatashita who is one of the top Judo instructors in North America, came to give instruction, but found the classes were so large, that some of the enthusiasts had to be turned away.

Now in the second year of instruction classes a greater turnout than ever is evident. Members of this instruction class joined in September to form a University of Toronto Judo Club. The executive are: Tony Grey, pres., Mas Matsui, vice pres. and Jack Wojciechowsky, sec. treas.

The club is hoping to initiate intercollegiate competition among Western, Assumption and Ryerson. The Athletic directorate has given official recognition to the University of Toronto club.

It is hoped that official tournaments can be organised by the start of the 1959-60 academic year. In the meantime the club will participate in exhibition matches. Such a tournament is scheduled for Feb. 14 at Kingston, with the above mentioned clubs competing.

Tonight at Hart House, during the half time period of the Basketball game, an exhibition of Judo will be displayed. Holds and techniques will be demonstrated and explained.

Varsity Swim Team Downs Niagara 57-29

By JOHN BROOKS
Varsity Sports Editor

Varsity swim Blues—aiming for an undefeated season—raced to their third consecutive victory last week-end with a weakened team and an absent coach.

Blues trounced Niagara University, 57-29, in Niagara Falls, N.Y., with Coach Bill Yorzyk remaining in Toronto to mastermind strategy for a key meet upcoming Friday night.

The American crew gave Varsity little difficulty. John Galullo was the only host to pose any problems, and he captured the 60-yard and 100-yard freestyle events.

Galullo also swam on Niagara's 400-yard sprint relay team, which gained the finish line ahead of a Varsity quartet that included none of the regular competitors in that event.

This weekend, the competition is tougher—much tougher. In a return meet, Blues travel to London Friday for battle with the Western Mustangs.

In mid-December, Mustangs succumbed, 59-27, to Varsity in a meet here that produced 10 records, including three new Canadian marks.

Bob Fisher collected one of those in the 200-yard backstroke, edging team-mate Edpath, who had set the old record last season. Fisher's time was 2:13.7 minutes, nine-tenths of a second better than the previous record.

Coach Yorzyk broke his own mark in the 200-yard butterfly, finishing 17 seconds faster than the former time of 2:06.5 minutes. Yorzyk was the only United States swimmer to earn a gold medal in the 1956 Olympic Games, and it was in the butterfly event.

Yorzyk and Edpath formed one-half of Varsity's 400-yard medley relay team that raced to a new Canadian record of 4:00.2 three-tenths of a second faster than the previous best.

John Deacon, a newcomer from Upper Canada College and Wolf

Unger were the other members of the record-setting crew.

The best Western had to offer in that meet was a splash performance by freestyle Dones Szvetko, who raced to victory in the 100-yard and 220-yard freestyle events.

Peter Bell, Pan-American Games competitor, outdistanced Deacon for victory in the 200-yard breast stroke event. Bell touched the wall three-fifths of a second ahead of the Varsity freshman.

On Friday, Coach Yorzyk anticipates a much harder meet.

"They know what to expect after swimming against us once, and they'll be tough... as a matter of fact, they'll be real tough," he suggested.

Yorzyk, however, expressed confidence in his team to knock aside the Westerners, and advance into February's Intercollegiate meet as odd-on favorites to retain the title.

Hoskin Ave. Will Get Warning Light Soon International Festival — The First For University

There will be no yellow warning light at the Hoskin Ave. crosswalk until the end of the month, a traffic division official of the Metro Public Works Dept. said yesterday.

R. R. Robertson said the overhead light "should be up by the end of the month, but we always allow a little leeway."

Meanwhile the wires to hold the light have already appeared, but they have had no apparent effect on motorists.

Various ingenious solutions to the problem of making drivers stop have been suggested by students, ranging from a flashing set of red lights, wig-wag signals and a railway-type crossing gate, to a giant poster of Mayor Nathan Phillips dressed in his new ceremonial robes and waving a summons.

As yet there have been no serious accidents at the crosswalk, but last Thursday a west-bound car swerved out of control and collided with another car only 100 yards from the crosswalk.

Several U of T clubs will this month hold a joint International Students' Festival, the first of its kind at this university.

Chinese, German, Polish, Ukrainian, Estonian and Japanese students, together with representatives of the International Students' Organization will sponsor the Festival, Jan. 30 and 31. A banquet in Hart House's Great Hall Friday, Jan. 30, will be followed by an exhibition of cultural achievements in the Debates Room, with folk songs and dances later in the Great Hall.

The exhibition in the Debates Room will be open to the general public Saturday.

Tickets for Friday evening are available at the Students' Administrative Council office, at Friendly Relations with Overseas Students, 3 Willcocks St. and from various representatives on campus. Deadline for obtaining tickets is Jan. 28.

The purpose of the Festival, the festival committee says, is to "establish mutual admiration, understanding and goodwill and hence advance mutual respect and friendship."

Blood Drive Machinery Gets Oiled

Students service representatives from all faculties received donor enrolment cards and campaign posters on Monday for this year's University of Toronto blood drive.

"The only way to get people to give blood is to approach them personally," campaign chairman Charlotte Hubbell told the service representatives. "That's your job."

The campaign is from Feb. 16 - 20 this year, and 2,500 pints of blood are needed.

Donors will be asked to fill out appointment cards as they pledge their blood. These cards are available from student service representatives in the various faculties, and must be taken to the clinic at the time of donation.

Blood is free in Toronto. It is required up to 1,500 times a day in the city, and the only supply is through donor contributions.

"Most blood will probably be used almost as soon as it comes from your arm," Miss Hubbell said Monday.

Blood cannot be kept, and the constant demand requires a steady supply. The campus will have its chance on the above five days.

Small Salamander Fire In Loretto Construction

By AL WALKER
Varsity Staff Reporter

Four fire-trucks roared on campus last night to squelch a small fire in the half-completed Loretto College residence on St. Mary's St.

No damage to the building was reported but the loss has been estimated at $250 in building materials.

Fire was caused when wind over-turned a cement-heater or "salamander" in the south-east corner of the fifth floor, firemen said.

"The fire was not serious at all", said Fire Chief William Reid. "It was only a one-alarm blaze." He said damage should not come to more than $250.

St. Mary's St. at the front of the new building was choked with four fire-trucks and other vehicles for almost an hour.

Night-watchmen Joe Vida said later he was down on the first floor getting more oil to refill the salamanders when the wind blew one of them over, and tarpaulins and stray lumber were ignited.

One of the first firemen to reach the fifth floor said the blaze was in pockets all over the cement floor.

"Obviously the salamander flipped over the high wind, and burning oil spilled out on the floor. We have a lot of trouble with these things," he said.

The salamanders are tall metal oil heaters used to keep cement in new buildings from cracking during the winter.

When the firemen arrived, one of the salamanders was still burning in another corner, and it took the men several minutes to extinguish it.

"There is no way to turn these things off, and they can't be put out by water," said a division captain huddled in the dampness of the unlighted building, "so we had to wait for a foam extinguisher."

The alarm was turned in at 11:12 p.m. from a police cruiser on Bay St., and a second time from a call-box five minute later, by an unknown person.

The fire was extinguished shortly before midnight.

Principal Of UC Retiring In July

Dr. F. C. A. Jeanneret, principal of University College, will retire from his post in July, it was announced yesterday.

Dr. Jeanneret will relinquish his position July 1. He has reached the retirement age for UC administrators.

A rose window in UC's West Hall commemorating his 50-year association with the college will be unveiled at a ceremony Sunday. The window is the gift of the UC Alumni Association.

Dr. Jeanneret graduated from UC in 1912, and has been a member of the college's teaching staff since completion of his post-graduate studies at the University of Chicago and the Sorbonne.

He was named head of his department in 1926 becoming U.C.'s youngest department head, and assumed the duties of principal after the death of Dr. W. R. Taylor in 1951.

Dr. Jeanneret has received honorary degrees from Laval and McMaster universities and the University of Montreal and he was created Officier d'Académie by the French Republic in 1940.

No successor to Dr. Jeanneret's post of principal has been announced. Dr. Jeanneret has not yet decided whether he will continue lecturing in French at UC.

Admit staff split

Rumors of a breach in staff relations at the Royal Ontario Museum were confirmed yesterday by museum director Theodore Heinrich.

The friction between staff members was caused by confusion of responsibilities, Mr. Heinrich said. It resulted from a program to integrate the museum's three divisions under one directorship begun three years ago.

H. M. Turner, chairman of the ROM board of governors, announced a new system of job definition is being worked out to eliminate cause of the discontent. The plan would clarify responsibilities of the three division heads and over 20 curators.

A system for purchase will also be put into effect, Mr. Turner said. Most of the present friction results from differences over purchases between division heads and Mr. Heinrich, the chairman said.

The "crux" of the disagreement lies in the museum's dual role as a public institution and a university department, Mr. Heinrich said. Some staff members do not concede that the museum has an obligation to the public as well as to the museum itself, he said.

Mr. Heinrich was appointed director of ROM 3½ years ago. He is a former assistant curator at New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art.

SAC at a glance

Constitution Nearly Drowns Council

Students' Administrative Council members last night waded halfway across their new constitution but left several little whirlpools of controversy unresolved.

Sitting as a committee of the whole SAC members disagreed about:

— representational voting by council on basis of faculty enrollment;

— authority of recall of representatives by individual faculty councils;

— impeachment machinery for use against SAC officers derelict in their duty;

— SAC control of its own financial policies;

— whether SAC president should be known as the "chief" or "senior" executive.

Strongest feeling was expressed over the representational voting issue. In a straw vote to discover the committee's feelings, large faculties favored retention of representation voting clause for extraordinary motions, the rest opposed it.

In practice, the SAC votes by simple majority of members, but under the present constitution can revert to the extraordinary method on application.

Voted down in committee by a majority composed of smaller faculties, large faculty reps threatened to invoke the representational voting clause to secure retention of the clause when council meets in proper session.

In other discussions, the committee threw out a proposed clause giving council "the power of impeachment by a vote of majority of its voting members." Members objected the clause was too clumsy and weak to serve a doubtful purpose as a backstop against officials derelict in their duties.

Decision on financial control was left until SAC executives met separately even if that rep were SAC president or vice-president.

That the SAC president should be known as "senior" executive.

News Snaps

Want material . . .

For St. Mike's, possibility remains that the Gryphon may yet prove phoenix. Joan Bulger, Writers' Group president and Gryphon editor, says the literary magazine will be published this term provided she gets material.

Doctors of art . . .

For Medsman, an Art and Photography contest has been launched by the Medical Society. Society's Arts and Letters chairman, Bill McIntyre, says deadline for entries in Jan. 31. Art work in any media or on any theme will be accepted. Winning entries will be displayed at the Meds At-Home Feb. 12.

Professors missing . . .

VICTORIA (CUP)—U of T President Claude Bissell yesterday warned an alumni group here a shortage of professors will soon bring a crisis in Canadian universities. Dr. Bissell said graduate schools were not turning out staff fast enough.

Lady is alone . . .

Ron Collier's Hart House jazz concert last night was heard by nearly 200 men and one woman. Cathy Mackinnon, sister of Toronto singer Margo Mackinnon, said she "just walked in with the musicians". Larry Lederman, of the Hart House Music committee accepted her "on sufferance".

barons of simcoe

Last term a well-known history professor developed before his academic and administrative colleagues a fascinating theory about the University of Toronto.

The professor, addressing a faculty luncheon to mark President Bissell's inauguration, maintained the university was the last outpost of feudalism in our society. The professor drew a convincing analogy between a feudal society and the present system of administration in our university. The president corresponds to the feudal monarch, faculty heads to his barons and of course the undergraduates become what they have never been allowed to believe they were not — serfs.

We reserve the anti-democratic implications of this theory for discussion at a later date. What concerns us now is the obvious inability under such a system to organize the serfs.

By nature of the university's size, the serfs must owe their first allegiance to the baronial estates which they serve. When the faculties or baronial estates can support a dramatic revue or a literary magazine, the serfs feel obligated to support their baron rather than the society as a whole.

It is then only possible to affect a unity of serfdom with larger enterprises like newspapers and bands. Attempts to sponsor an all-campus literary magazine or an all-campus revue are weakened by the priority serfs owe their barons.

This implied and perhaps deliberate disunity among serfs satisfies the barons but destroys much of the creative possibilities inherent in the society. Historical precedent gives two possible remedies for the situation. One is the impractical remedy brought about by a serf revolution. The other and more likely possibility is that the king, dissatisfied with his barons, will unite with the serfs to sponsor their rights.

The French Disease

By SAM AJZENSTAT

For a long time now the west has been worried about France. Long before the collapse of the Fourth Republic the almost endless succession of governments each trying to form some kind of unity out of a factional National Assembly was an alarming sight. France was characterized, as a country against herself, as the latest "sick man of Europe." Her plight called forth demands for an "agonizing reappraisal."

Now there is a new republic, the Fifth, under the steady and popular hand of General Charles de Gaulle but the question remains how long will it last.

It will be asked again tonight in Hart House when His Excellency Francis Lacoste, French Ambassador to Canada will be the special guest at a debate on the resolution "The Fifth Republic is here to stay."

There is much reason to believe that the Fifth Republic is here to stay. The new constitution is in many ways a promising document. (a) By increasing the power of the president it puts France in a better position to survive changes of government. Especially important in this respect, though not without its dangers is the article which delegates "emergency powers" to the president. Another unifying factor is the election of the president by municipal officials.

(b) The idea of a French Community offers the hope of a solution of the colonial problem. Colonies are offered independence, integration with France, or autonomy within a community. The choice is up to them.

(c) A new set of relations between the strengthened branch of the government and the legislature, between the prime minister with his cabinet and the National Assembly may keep French governments from toppling as often as they have.

(d) The very presence of de Gaulle as president, his work in laying down new traditions of unity is a strong factor in ensuring French stability.

However against every point that indicates stability for France in the future, negative points can be made.

(a) The French are still wary of dictators and they may not be willing to give the next president of France as much power as they are willing to give de Gaulle. If the president's powers are removed a major stabilizing force is removed. But there are things the French people fear more than instability.

(b) It is impossible to predict success for the community plan. Integration with France will almost certainly involve considerable problems and autonomy cannot possibly please all elements in the colonies.

(c) The threat of dissolution by the president is a somewhat arbitrary way of holding an assembly together.

(d) Although the French may fear that any president but de Gaulle would be tempted to wield too much authority, a more real danger is that he would not be able to wield enough. It has been pointed out by various commentators that the system of election by municipal authorities would tend to put into office a less imposing man than de Gaulle.

These points hardly begin to scratch the surface of a complex issue. The French have taken resolute steps to cure what has been called her sickness. She has surprised many people. For through all the bewailing very few gave her credit for being able to solve her own problems, or even diagnose them.

The French view of the French problem, a view to which we have given too little heed, will be represented at the debate tomorrow night by the special guest, George White (IISPS) and John Smart (II SMC) represent the Ayes. For the Noes, Keith Spicer and Peter V. Bishop, both graduate students. The debate begins at 8 p.m. tonight.

As an important NATO power and an essential link in western defence, France deserves the understanding of her allies. Her problems are to some extent our problems. Her courageous moves to solve them demand our respect. The Fifth Republic should be here to stay. Whether it is or not is another question.

Rochester Tops Blues With 70-64 Victory

By JOHN & HARRY MUDGE

In an exhibition thriller last night, Rochester Tech bested Varsity basketball Blues by a 70-64 score. At the end of the first half, the Rochester quintet led, 35-34, mainly on their domination of both backboards.

The smaller but scrappier Varsity team was led by the brilliant outside shooting of Peter Potter and Ruby Richman, who combined for 37 points.

In the opening minutes of the second half, the determined Varsity crew, this time led by the outside shooting of Joe Stulac, shot into a 46-41 lead.

At that stage of the game, Rochester, led by big Ed Baucum — who pumped in 29 points — took complete control of both boards as Varsity's big men were completely outshone.

Quickly regaining their momentarily-lost lead, the Rochester team went ahead to stay. The game was actually won on the free-throw line, as Rochester sank 30 of 39 attempts while Blues made 14 out of 18.

From the field, Blues outscored the visitors by a 50-40 count.

In the opening game, Osgoode Hall defeated Varsity Baby Blues 62-59. Trailing throughout the game, Osgoode finally solved the Varsity zone defense in the final minutes to pull ahead.

Rouge et Or outshot Redmen, 35-14.

Skule D took a narrow, 41-40, decision from Victoria Fourths in cage action. Colburgh led the winners with 12, while Wisz added eight. Glavin and McElhinney netted 13 and 10, respectively, for Vic.

Fontana and Renzetti were big guns for St. Mike's Gabis in their 53-29 slaughter of Medicine First Year. Fontana had 25 and his cohort 16. Corliss hooped 13 for the Doctors.

Cheques Available Now At Simcoe Hall Office

There are still more than 300 Dominion-Provincial type B bursary cheques to be picked up at the Chief Accountant's office at Simcoe Hall, officials said yesterday.

These cheques are for those receiving bursaries after attending one year of university. They vary in value from $100 to $500.

The cheques were not available earlier in the term because the office was occupied with taking second instalment fees.

Simcoe Hall officials ask students concerned to pick up their cheques as soon as possible.

Students Band To Push Sporadic Tibetan Revolt

About 25 U of T students have banded together to publicize a little-known revolt in Tibet "comparable to the Hungarian uprising," group member Pat Wooten (I Trin) announced last night.

The revolt has continued in an off-and-on manner since the Communist Chinese took over Tibet in 1950, Wooten said. "It flared up," he said, last summer, when the revolt spread from two eastern provinces to almost the whole of Tibet.

News of the uprising has been "hushed up" by several countries in the region, including India, Wooten said.

No Western journalist has been allowed in Tibet since the Communist takeover in 1950, he said. An invitation extended by the Tibetan government for Indian prime minister Nehru to visit the mountain country last September was cancelled by the Communist Chinese.

India has forbidden Tibetan ex-patriots in India to participate in politics or give press interviews on pain of expulsion from the country within 24 hours, Wooten said.

One U of T professor has shown interest in the group Wooten said. Students involved in the movement include Peter Dembski (II SMC), Jeremy Johnston (IV Trin), Dave Crane (II Vic) and Ann Casey (II SMC).

The group hopes to have the issue brought up in the House of Commons and ultimately in the United Nations, Crane said.

Students interested in the movement are asked to contact any of the above students.

Maison Hart Dit Mais Oui A la République Cinquième

By TERRY BOURKE
Varsity Staff Reporter

A standing ovation and a rousing anthem greeted the guest at the first bilingual debate in Hart House history last night.

His Excellency Francis Lacoste, French Ambassador to Canada, entered the Debates Room as the audience roared out the French National Anthem, "La Marseilles".

Speaking for the victorious government resolution "The Fifth Republic is Here to Stay", the ambassador said, "There seems to be in the world today the attitude that De Gaulle is a vicious dictator out to dominate and squash all those under him."

De Gaulle has an aspiration to glory," the ambassador said, "which is not a malicious ambition but one directed toward the development of spiritual motives".

Answering a suggestion from the floor that France is "in an economic shambles," M. Lacoste said France started expanding its economy after the war "from scratch" until now it produces "twice the economic output of 1938."

Defending French occupation of Algeria, he said, "It is of vital importance that the southern bank of the Mediterranean is not lost to 'dangerous outside interests'."

Earlier, first government speaker G.M. White (II SPS) argued the new constitution of the Fifth Republic "will be the backbone of the French nation as long as there is a France."

Stressing past French greatness, White said, "The nation has a remarkable claim to intellectual France's number one representative in Canada summed up his opinion of the Canadian people last night "unprejudiced and unsophisticated."

His excellency Francis Lacoste, Ambassador of France applauded Canadians for their "open-minded, frank, and concrete approach to the highly explosive political problems of the world."

A short stout man with sparkling eyes, Mr. Lacoste said Canada is playing a vital role in the world today acting as a "calm in the storms between Russia and the United States, Europe and Asia."

Mentioning the New European Common Trade market the ambassador denied rumours the formation of the community would "freeze Canada out of the European markets and submerge it to the status of a US economic puppet."

"On the contrary," he said, "it was the aim of the French government in entering the market to make available to Canada a strong, ripe, and united economic plan for this country's merchants."

He called Toronto a quiet town "If Canadians think the pace of living in this city fast they should try Paris on for size," he said.

"Next to Paris where the five o'clock rush goes on for twenty-four hours a day" the hustle and bustle of Toronto can be equated to that of a quiet village."

He said Canadian university students struck him as being "stiffer and cooler in their attitude toward life next to their more easy-going French university counterparts."

The ambassador has been posted in Ottawa for three years. Commenting on the de Gaulle administration he said the "Fifth Republic is offering the French people the finest form of government since the end of the war."

DEBATERS argued loud and long last night to decide the fate of France's Fifth Republic. Here French Ambassador Francis Lacoste defends his mother country in the Hart House Great Hall.

York and Waterloo

New Universities

Private members' bills due to be introduced in the Ontario legislature during the coming legislature session will call for the formation of a new Toronto university named York University and the incorporation as universities of three existing colleges in Waterloo.

Notice of the bills has been received by Roderick Lewis, clerk of the legislature.

The private bill asks all the usual powers, rights and privileges of a university, including the power to affiliate or be federated with any other university.

Three separate bills will call for the incorporation as universities of St. Jerome's College, a Catholic institution, the secular Waterloo College and the Evangelical Lutheran Seminary, all in Waterloo.

Legislature clerk Lewis yesterday said the colleges might be asking for separate incorporation as universities in order to be able to federate with each other while preserving religious autonomy.

Liberal provincial leader Paul Wintermeyer will introduce the three bills.

The men making the application regarding York University are Air Vice-Marshal Wilfred A. Curtis, James Robbins Kidd, Thos. Richardson London, Stan-

Fine Architect Students For Felling SPS Tree

Sixteen first-year U of T architecture students were yesterday fined $200 collectively for removing the remains and decorations of an Engineering Society Christmas Tree already topped by another group Dec. 17.

The penalty was levied by the university's supreme disciplinary body, the Caput, at a meeting yesterday afternoon.

At a previous meeting the Caput fined the five-man group that topped the tree $50 each, and suspended them from holding office in university organizations until the end of the 1959-60 session.

Two men, saying they represented the 16-man group fined yesterday, protested the harshness of the penalty last night.

"No property damage was done," they said. "We did something that had to be done anyway because the top of the tree was off."

The carrying-off of the tree's remains, they said, was "strictly a first-year scheme."

"We were trying to raise a little spirit within the school," they continued. "Maybe we went a little bit too far."

The Caput statement following the Jan. 10 meeting when five students were fined said:

"During the consideration of the case evidence was brought to suggest that the remainder of the . . . tree, together with the decorations of the tree, had been removed by a group of students . . . to their Fraternity House. The Caput decided to take early action to examine the individuals who appeared to be concerned"

SKATERS are known to be fanatics about their sport, but Wendy Law (IV UC) even took advantage of ice on the Back Campus last night. She was "tired of studying," she said.

Plan Anglo-US Exchanges

LONDON (Special)—A student federation founded at Downing College, Cambridge University, England, and in Bryn Mawr, women's college, Pennsylvania are considering establishing a regular student summer exchange.

The group, known as the Anglo-American Student Federation, plans its first student exchange this summer.

This year about 80 British students are to visit North America and 80 American students, half from the United States and half from Canada, are to visit Britain.

At present, the federation says, a greater number of Canadian students are desired. The federation offers inexpensive air travel.

Students will be in Britain from about June 29 to Sept. 21, and will be able to take on employment during this period to cover part of the expenses.

Interested students should immediately contact the North American secretary, the Anglo-American Student Federation, Miss R.S. Bishop, Graduate Center, Bryn Mawr College Bryn Mawr, Penn. for details. Those interested in employment should inquire at the National Union of Students, 13 Edsleigh St. London W.1.

No Sign of Sign Department Lost

University College is about ready to buy a new department directory-sign to hang outside its English department.

The directory, listing professors' office-numbers, has been missing for about two months.

Martin Robb, university police chief, feels the sign's disappearance may be "another student prank." The police have not seen hide nor hair of the sign since, and have no clues as to its whereabouts.

UC caretaker said a new sign will be bought soon if the old one is not found.

Plan Psychology Talks For Parents and Pupils

University of Toronto psychology professors will help parents to go back to school with their teenaged children next month as Etobicoke high schools inaugurate a new lecture series entitled "A Psychologist Looks at Education".

Each of the visiting lecturers will deliver the same lecture twice -- to the students in morning and their parents that evening.

Dr. Carlton Williams, head of the university's Department of Extension and one of the visiting lecturers, said last night he understood the idea behind the series was to encourage student-parent discussions.

"Having equipped both parents and students with the same information, they will then be able to thrash over the discussion at home", he said.

Schedule for the lectures is as follows:

Feb. 9, Dr. Carlton Williams, at Burnhamthorpe collegiate; Feb. 10, Dr. M. F. Grapko of the Department of Child Study, at Richview collegiate; and Dr. R. C. Joyner, Department of Psychology, Etobicoke collegiate; Feb. 11, Dr. Karl Bernhardt, Department of Psychology, speaks to a joint meeting of Alderwood and Royal York students at Royal York collegiate. Feb. 12, Dr. William Line, Department of Psychology, at Thistletown collegiate.

Topics include: "What schools can do to encourage learning", "Is there too much pressure at schools?" and "Are examinations a criterion of success?"

New Political Party In U of A Parliament

EDMONTON (CUP) — In answer to the "complacency and stagnation" of existing parties a new political party has emerged on the University of Alberta campus.

The National Federal Party made its appearance on campus in time for the Model Parliament scheduled for Jan. 20-21.

In a press statement the party's directors announced "the movement has arisen to combat the complacency and stagnation of the old-time parties, whose policies are directed by individuals far removed from the needs of our country".

"We seek to instill in every Canadian a sense of deep national pride . . . and will provide the leadership necessary to utilize this (Canada's) potential," it concluded.

Directors P. J. Clooney and Murray Dale advocated complete federal control of education and a revision in certain economic controls, resulting in more investments by Canadians in Canada.

Also included: immediate recognition of Red China and the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag.

ROMANS IN LOVE: AVR leads Sandy Stephenson and Roger White find rehearsing can be fun. (VSP Horban)

Can Virgins Marry? AVR Men Won't Tell

All Varsity Revue officials have solved two big production problems in the last week, producer Bill Lord said last night.

Bothered by whether vestal virgins are historically allowed to fall in love and marry, officials did some research and reached a decision. "But we're not divulging the secret of the best extravaganza this side of the Nile," Lord said.

Another production problem cropped up after fire broke out on the Hart House theatre stage during a Central Ontario Drama Festival production two weeks ago.

Since one of the major scenes in "Have Toga, Will Travel" is the burning of Rome on stage, officials thought of throwing out the sequence. "But since it's our big, spectacular number we're having all the Praetorian guards stand backstage with helmets full of water", Lord said.

Invitations to a gala black-tie opening night also brought problems for the AVR producer. Several invited campus dignitaries have inquired what is meant by a black tie. The phrase means a request that a dinner jacket or tuxedo be worn, Lord said. Those who buy tickets for the first night are not required to wear a black tie, he said.

No tickets have yet been sold for opening night, officials said. Biggest sales have been for Friday and Saturday night, they said. Weekend seats are almost one-quarter reserved after two days of ticket sales.

Tickets cost $1.50 for seats Feb. 9-12, and $1.75 for weekend seats Feb. 13-14. They are available in the Students' Administrative Council office. Only a limited number of seats will be sold on Monday's opening night.

Over 300 campus, city and provincial dignitaries have been invited to attend the opening performance Feb. 9.

The original bookshow traces the trials and tribulations of Emperor Nero in 58 A.D. when conspiring Senators plotted to overthrow the throne. A love interest adds to the complications.

It's Bad Public Relations!

VANCOUVER (CUP) — A Vancouver General Hospital Nurse suspended from class for two weeks for kissing her boy friend in broad daylight is scheduled to return to classes Monday.

"A kiss is a kiss and is harmless up to a point," the Hospital's Public Relations Department Director said. "But when this kind of thing is going on in broad daylight strong objections can be taken." The nurse involved "had been warned before," he said.

But the general feeling among the other nurses is that such incidents should be dealt with by the nurses' Student Council. The Council is reportedly seeking legal advice on their exact rights under the existing student constitution.

A student councillor said "there are too many inconsistencies in disciplinary measures." While it does not ask that the nurse be reinstated, the Council wishes "permission" to help redraft the rule book so we will have everything down in black and white," she added.

There Is No Bamboo Curtain For Dr. Wilson

By JOHN GRAY

Canadian J. Tuzo Wilson stepped off the Moscow-Peking Express late last August to be greeted by the smiling representatives of the People's Republic of China.

It was the beginning of a three-week tour, and as a guest of the government, Wilson was out to discover the scientific heart of the "new China."

At the University of Toronto Dr. J. Tuzo Wilson is a Professor of Geophysics. In the broad world of science he is President of the International Union of Geodesy and Geophysics, a leader in the organization of the International Geophysical Year.

It was in this capacity that Dr. Wilson last summer invited himself to the two Chinas—the mainland and her island refugees across the Taiwan strait. Following an IGY meeting in Moscow, Dr. Wilson toured through China, the home of one quarter of the world's population, but one of the least-visited countries in the world.

For Dr. Wilson and his fellow scientists there is no Bamboo Curtain.

He travelled freely throughout China inspecting various scientific institutes of geophysics and related studies.

He was an object of curiosity on the streets of the land where few foreigners are seen. "But in the scientific institutions he discovered many mutual friends with the learned men of China."

It was during the tour that Dr. Wilson discovered that science, along with athletics and art, remain the only languages in which the whole world can converse.

The different parts of the scientific world are all interdependent for stimulation and ideas, but in the humanities there is almost complete insularity.

The Chinese were interested in him because he represented a different section in the march of science. That he was the product of a Western culture did not matter, for science is once more trying to evolve and unify her own culture, satisfied with its present form.

Cut off from the Western world by the sagacity of American foreign policy, China no longer is much interested in the development of Western humanities. It was in his role as a leading scientist that the Chinese deemed Wilson a colleague, and it appears little can jeopardize this relationship.

Of all the impressions coming from his tour, Dr. Wilson today remembers the universality of science as the high-point, and the necessity of humanism as a guiding principle if the people of the world are to break down the barriers they have arbitrarily erected.

"The main problem now facing us is not how to beat the Russians and Chinese, but how to live with them," he explains. "What worries me is that we have been so isolationist."

China cannot afford to be isolationist, and has maintained a thorough scientific contact with the West.

All scientific periodicals are collected and catalogued under three alphabets for the thousands of students and scholars throughout the country.

In Canada, where scientists have at the most two languages in which they are at all conversant, scientific journals are catalogued only in English, leaving considerable fields still unresearched.

It was in the exploding expansion of the scientific institutes that Dr. Wilson saw the most tangible evidence of the "vast" education system now in China.

China is striving towards the egalitarianism that the West has taken for granted, overcoming the distance with giant strides. They are trying to train intellectual leaders to raise the literacy rate and to provide China for the first time with universal education.

In Peking, dormitories, offices, and laboratories are rising from the muddy ground to form the Institute of Geophysics and Meteorology. Soon within in those many walls there will be 100,000 students and scholars hard at work.

China has taken substantial steps toward the study of one of her major natural hazards—earthquakes. Seismology stations are scattered throughout China, and there has been a project to discover the historical patterns of earthquakes—10,000 references dating back to 1189 B.C.

Weather stations since 1935 have increased from 50 to 1,500.

Posters in China's 200 universities direct pointed warnings to faculty members who may be coming in their scientific or political judgment.

Students themselves lead a rigorous life and learn more. Dr. Wilson encountered one group of students who rose at 6 a.m., took classes from 8-12 a.m., and spent from 2:30-9:30 p.m. performing voluntary manual labor.

Education has become a major force in China—to the point where Canadian students are "underprivileged children."

"We have neglected our scholars terribly," says Wilson. "Canadian students have not nearly developed their potential."

China is not only working very hard to provide all her people with opportunity for education, but is striving to give more complete training to those who have more potential as scholars, he said. In this respect Canada is falling far behind.

Across the tumultuous Taiwan Strait Dr. Wilson found almost the same picture in the field of education.

But the picture of the people themselves is a little different. During his stay he saw no native Formosans, only emigrant Chinese who fled the mainland during the Revolution.

The people were happy and charming. "I was treated extremely handsomely in both countries," but there was just a touch of homesickness.

When they found he had been to the mainland, they assailed him with questions about conditions and more especially about their fellow scientists.

Before the Revolution many of them had worked together in educational institutions (Continued on Page 10)

Royalty is a fine and noble tradition, one of the last bastions of a dignified concept of society which is gradually being swallowed up in a feverish race of self-appointed political saviours whose duty is not something they are born to fulfill, but something they may or may not strive to understand.

It is a shame that many of the remnants of this tradition no longer exist in the same aura of respect they once did, but are more and more being subjected to the vulgar curiosity of the people to know all and to talk about it.

It is disquieting to see the "true confessions" of a princess shouted from the panels of delivery trucks or made available on the same shelf, indeed on the same pages as a new interpretation of the simple-minded antics of a Hollywood belly-dancer, who must needs stay simple-minded to stay alive.

Such things can no longer be attributed to a tradition but can only be pointed to sadly as indications of a new standard imposed upon royalty which it can refuse to acknowledge but can never abolish. It is perhaps more fair to say that people may always have had these tendencies but never before have had such opportunities to display them.

In the light of this frequent disrespect towards royalty, it is interesting to evaluate some of the tokens of respect which are still so rigidly adhered to. Many, to our way of thinking, are every bit as ludicrous and out of place as their opposites.

Take last Saturday night as an example. We had been to see Cat on a Hot Tin Roof, an absorbing and somewhat exhausting movie in anyone's terms. It was the late show and the theatre was crowded.

As the closing scene disappeared from the screen, we settled back for a few seconds to relax and try to piece together the significance of the past two and a half hours. But the theatre management had something else in mind.

Onto the screen flashed one of the dowdiest, most unattractive pictures of Her Majesty we have ever seen—and the Queen, with all due respect, is not noted for her photogenic qualities. Part of the audience, bored but resigned, struggled to its feet; the other part ignored the National Anthem and made for the nearest exit. Piercing the traditional drum roll came an usher's shrill admonition: "No smoking in here, sir". Across the depressing visage before us a shabby curtain squeaked and rattled and throughout the theatre giggling and snorts of amusement responded to its dubious homage.

God Save the Queen and thank you for your patronage. Please come again soon!

It isn't that we object to the National Anthem, or to pictures of the Queen—there are some very attractive ones to which anyone might respond with a twinge of pride. We object to the complete disregard to time and place that has reduced something rich with meaning to the level of match-box advertising — it comes with the food, compliments of the management. Old fashioned as this may seem, a sense of decorum must be preserved if royalty, in its present vague but perhaps most valuable form, is to survive.

For a start, we suggest to theatres such as the one mentioned, that they play the National Anthem before the performance, and that they serve the dual purpose of attracting a greater response and not spoiling the dramatic effect of Williams-Kazan and the like at their best.

Then perhaps, there might be grounds for defending royalty from onslaughts of vulgar publicity.

The Speech from the Throne opening Parliament this week announced the government was encouraged at "the evidence of recovery from the recession", not long before Labour Minister Starr told the House of Commons there were almost 750,000 unemployed as of Jan. 8.

A pretty ex-revolutionary who used to go by the code name "Deborah" announced her plans to marry Fidel Castro's brother Raul, while deposed strongman Fulgencio Batista denounced Fidel's executions of former Batista henchmen as being prompted by "a lust for blood".

Royalty are really just plain folks Department; Prince Philip, accepting yet another honorary degree, from the University of Delhi, confessed ruefully that he's on a academic degrees were really honorary ones.

Maurice Ruddick, the guitar-playing Negro miner who comforted his fellow-workers during their terrible days underground in the Springhill disaster, has been named the Toronto Telegram's Citizen of the Year. Meanwhile, Decent White Protestant Americans in Virginia, U.S.A., are rolling up their sleeves preparing to battle two court decisions aimed at stopping the closing of high schools threatened with integration.

And "from ministries and laboratories all over the world reports of preparation for biological battle are beginning to emerge — processes described as 'deadlier than a dirty H-bomb'." Dr. Brock Chisholm and Toronto's Sir Robert Watt, inventor of radar, are expressing their alarm in the form of "a crusade to bring the facts into the open" — And so to bed.

civil life

With the newspapers full of Avro Arrows and nuclear tests our defence system begins to look more and more like an offence system.

There would be nothing wrong in this if we were still living in a world where the best defence is an offence. But that was long ago. Today even our politicians seem to realize that our weapons are obsolete as soon as they are developed, and that even with up-to-date weapons, a push-button war would be over almost as soon as it had begun. The victor: the first man to press the button.

One would think that the moral of this story would be clear: that in such a war the first consideration would not be retaliation but the immediate protection of the civilian population. In other words, civil defense.

But in spite of the realization on the part of all concerned, politicians included, that the next war will be not a war between armies but "a war of all against all", civil defense arrangements have been only spasmodic in the United States and almost non-existent in Canada. The first bomb to fall on us will not be the mock bomb of a civil defense evacuation exercise. It will be the real thing and the only reaction that will be natural to us will be panic unmitigated by training, organization, or careful preparation.

There is no reason why there should not be such training, organization, and preparation. It would cost considerably less than the Avro Arrow or American-made missiles. It would have far fewer diplomatic repercussions since its only object would be the saving of lives. It is a cause in which the mildest pacifist could join forces with the fiercest militarist without either giving up his principles.

Yet there is no such organization. In the Canadian universities and schools in which principles of organization such as spatial localization and groups under teachers are already present, nothing has been done to utilize them for quick and efficient movement from the scene of a possible nuclear blast. And in the thousands of homes among which no such natural organizational relation exists, the problem is even more pressing.

In view of this it does not seem unreasonable to ask the government to take a few moments off from the pressing problem of how to equip ourselves to do the most damage for the least money to consider the more vital question of the civil preparedness of its citizens.

If the sirens have to sound we would prefer them to be signals for orderly evacuation rather than general chaos. SA

Age of our Father

"But Mummy, it's so fun-making to go out with Billy!"

Mummy didn't think so. Bill was too brash, too modern. He wore his clothes with a cut, not like George used to wear them. He smoked too much, he drank too much, he was in that fast new car; what was it called... a La Salle. Why he hadn't even finished Billy was altogether too irresponsible to be taking Janie out at all.

But Mummy didn't voice these objections. Her stern Victorian values shattered by the civilized chaos and the loss of George, she merely nodded her greying head and bowed before the desires of her glib, gleeful daughter.

Billy stuck — which was unusual. The couple waltzed through the next few years in a milky, quiet, married and then landed flat on their backsides with little money and the first five or ten years of their struggles, you were born.

THE CLOTH FROCK---

A RECOGNIZED PARIS VOGUE

Extravagant Paris has turned practical and is reckoning the smartness of her wardrobe in terms of cloth frocks. And the well turned out college girl taking her cue from Paris numbers cloth frocks amongst her newest togs. To lectures, to tea, even to dinner they go undeniably modish, adding charm to her every day existence.

In all probability you came later... in '37, '38 or probably '39. You opened your eyes on a disillusioned world, a world but a very tired world. The old order had fallen and a hundred thousand different answers for a new one didn't seem to work. By the time you were able to think, you thought in terms of war. Daddy didn't make very much. Daddy wasn't the exception perhaps in the form of a weekly air-mail folder from "somewhere in England". Anyway, it didn't matter very much. You walked to school, stepping on all the cracks in the pavement firmly believing it would break Hitler's back. Every day you paid 25 cents and put a little stamp to stick in a victor

EDIT MARY PHIBBS

Why did your father look so tired every time you talked about the Twenties and the Thirties? Why, when he did talk, did it seem so wonderful and so sad?
What was it about these 20 years, the years your parents grew up in, and the era which is your most immediate influence, which seems at once so remote and so close; so wonderful—and so terrible?

In a series of articles, we, the younger generation, will try to analyse the hopes and fears, the motives and the premonitions, the philosophy and the ambitions of our fathers. The series will appear under separate heads: Sociology, History, Art, Economy and Aftermath. Our analysis will not be complete. It will ignore the common symbols of the era—the coon-coats, the Charleston, Wall Street, the breadlines and the Swastika. It will try to probe deeper, to answer more basic questions than the average impression will give you. Where possible, the writers will try to find patterns of development and to give answers. The main emphasis will be on Canada, but the story of the era can only properly be interpreted with the United States and Europe close to mind.

The age of our fathers was remarkable. It began after what still remains the most barbarous catastrophe in the history of the world; a catastrophe to end catastrophes. For ten years it seemed to climb with steady beat of implausibility, madness resounding upon madness, until it reached a crescendo of despair. The orchestra stopped with the baton raised, the players motionless, and the audience hushed. For the next years the wind instrument redominated, rising with a steady wail of deflated terror to explode in a boom of war drums once again.

It was an age of cynicism and rebellion, fabrication and great art. The elements were so mixed in it that no creed or doctrine was not given a hearing. The age of Waugh and DeMille, of Eliot and Pies in the Sky; the age of Strangers and the "other side of paradise", of Wastelands and the White Cliffs of Dover, the age of Barrymore and bootlegging, Runyon and the four horsemen of the Apocalypse; black and white, greatness and failure, stupidity and nuclear physics; an age of death rays and television, radium and the Snyder Trophy; realists, idealists, positivists and the glow of existentialism; an age which began with Winter
"setting its foot upon the threshold leading up to Spring" and was gone with the wind.

DeMille, Alfalfa

Two For The Show

By PAUL CONROY

Every newspaper in Canada and the United States carried the story of Cecil B. DeMille's death. The same papers also told on page four of the death of one Carl "Alfalfa"
Switzer, also of Hollywood.

Each in his own way helped to mould the motion picture industry.

DeMille by producing often tasteless, but always entertaining epics swifter with the character "Alfalfa" of the "Our Gang" comedies of the thirties.

DeMille died the way a man of his years and position should. Switzer died in a screaming automobile as the result of a brawl.

The one man made famous with such movies as "The King of Kings", "The Story Of Doctor Wassel" and of course "The Ten Commandments". A rather modest tribute to his memory might be the story of his young killer who when asked what the Ten Commandments was replied
"It was a movie".

The other man may have cost over half a million dollars to put on the screen, but his first picture was a success in pictures.

Both were part of Hollywood, two big names to millions.
Perhaps the movie-goers of the thirties could have told you who either was but would have given you a blank stare if told about DeMille.

DeMille devoted most of his life to the production of motion pictures and he was one of the few of the pioneers who had a theatre background — his brother was a playwright and he was the first man in North America to produce a full-length movie, "The Squaw Man". He was also the first man to select California as the best place to produce motion pictures.

Critics clobbered him. His pictures were sneered at by those who felt that only the filmmakers of Europe could make movies an Art-form.

Switzer gave his childhood to the playing of his one role, that of a reckless-headed kid with a big grin. One of his pictures, "The Little General" is a classic. He hadn't made a picture in years and the re-issuing of his films on TV didn't net him a dollar.

Switzer should have, like De-Mille, died at the peak of his career.

IT WAS ANYTHING BUT WEARY, WEDNESDAY

When Ron Collier's men played "Weary" Wednesday afternoon, they got the greatest audience reaction I have ever seen. During an especially moving duet between bassist Carney Bray and guitarist Ed Bickert, there was absolute silence and even the sound of Ron's dropping the old grey felt hat which he uses as a mute seemed thunderous. This attention is what the group needs to be fully understood and appreciated. Although the jazz these men play is often very difficult, comprising as it does complex chord changes underneath a completely improvised melodic line, it is as emotionally wrenching as any jazz I have ever heard.

As a concession to popular taste, the quintet opened with an extended version of "Autumn Leaves", one of the three completely improvised numbers. A delicate intro by Bickert contributed a moving solo, technically polished as always, and received excellent support by Bray. Drummer Ron Rully laid down a snappy beat and both Collier and Bernie Pilch ("that's right, alto, clarinet and flute,") showed themselves as technical experts in a free-falling coda.

But in "Stratford Adventure" the audience had its first real taste of jazz as Ron Collier Pilch's flute began this Collier arrangement, and before it was half over I could see just how unrestricted this group is. They use the method of a written introduction to set the mood, and then improvise choruses over arranged chord changes, or even rhythmic patterns by Rully. In this number, Pilch used all his instruments in turn, and Collier used a succession of mutes, including that wonderful old hat, to achieve new sounds.

The second all improvised number, "Fair Wind", contained some simple but expressive groupings by Bray, a lovely solo by Bickert with some neat alternating major and minor chords somehow reminiscent of "Dancing in the Dark" although he didn't quote, and a drum solo by Rully for those who like that sort of thing.

"Weary" was unquestionably the best. Here the group really reached out for the audience and found most of them. In an incredible intro, Collier was about an eighth of a tone flat all the way through, and the effect was wonderful. A real jazz sound.

Here I heard once again the phenomenon of such a close blend of sound between Collier's heavily muted trombone and Pilch's clarinet that the two were indistinguishable. They managed to express all the sadness of "St. James' Infirmary" with a bit of "For Every Man There's a Woman" thrown in.

Collier re-introduced the members of his group just before the last number, politely waiting for applause, which managed to break the undefinable link between performer and listener.

"This is a suite in four movements, with none of them related," said Collier brightly before this one. And they certainly weren't connected.

Mood I had a distinct Casbah sound with Pilch's clarinet wailing like a hindu snake-charmer. Exotic rhythm breaks by Rully added to the effect, as did a driving, rising crescendo of sound with all members joining in turn. A short tour de force for Bickert contained some expertly-placed two bar rests having a tremendous emotional shock effect.

The provision of programs was much appreciated, as was Collier's introduction of each number. The complete lack of audience-performer relations characteristic of so many groups was refreshingly not a fault of this one.

Jeune Peinture et Sculpture

"It appertains to madness; it is a deliberate excursion into the realm of the horrible and the execrable. One might surmise that all these pictures were painted with closed eyes by the insane, who on tin palattes mixed, haphazard, the most violent colors."

This certainly wasn't written in 1959 — art critics have better manners and less wit today. It's a newspaper review from 1877, ridiculing a group of bohemian artists that included Pissarro, Degas, Monet and Renoir. Today after 75 years of such outrageous judgments, critics have learned to treat all new-comers gingerly.

It looks as if no exhibition of paintings by young Parisian artists today could stir up such a storm of angry scoffing, but maybe today the exhibition wouldn't even be worth the effort. The display of paintings by young French and German artists now at the Art Gallery of Toronto (until Feb. 8) is a disappointing one. Called Biennale '57, it was seen in Paris two years ago.

Far from being the kind of work to spark a controversy these paintings are all in familiar, too familiar modern idioms. The styles and gimmicks to be seen in Biennale '57, in fact are so familiar that we can call them academic.

Most of the sculpture in the Paris exhibition had to be eliminated for the Canadian display, because of heavy transportation costs, I suppose. This is a pity. With a few exceptions, like the work of Anne Kahane and Louis Archambault, there is little Canadian sculpture of worth to be seen, and almost none of it what you could call modern. The few sculptures in the Biennale '57, in contrast with what we're used to, seem fresh and unusual.

Not only are the jeunes artistes using outworn styles, with apparently little to say in them, they often don't seem to understand the modern conventions they have adopted. More than one painting is what I would call a hoax, not because the artist wasn't sincere, but because nothing comes across but bored feeling.

For anyone who has a catalogue of the exhibition, here are some of the paintings I'd say are hoaxes: of the Germans, no. 36, D. Rudolph's Formes Concretas dans L'Espace; no. 21, O. Kolb's Avec un Centre Noir; and of the French, no. 6, Barre's Peinture; no. 11, Bierge's Nu Accoude, and no. 43, Lagrange's La Nouvelle Serre.

But there are some not-to-be-missed. In the sculpture, F. Koenig's Animal and De Crozals' Centaure are both utterly delightful. The centaur has a face like a Peter Whalley cartoon. Another is Buffet's Femme, a striking and attractive picture by the biggest name in the exhibition with a dry, angular and contemporary "post- Impressionist" style that's earning the artist millions.

H. Kitzel's Arlequin Assis, no. 19 in the German section of the catalogue, has a clown with a face like Toad of Toad Hall—a bit of Picasso and Walt Kuhn, but more competent, expressing all the emotions a clown's face is supposed to according to modern iconography.

H. J. Burger's iconography is anything but modern. Icons, no. 8 in the German section is a sampler of the life of Christ in the genuine old style, a sketchy crude Romanesque manner that employs some rather effective dark pastel colors, dark pinks, dark mauves, olive, soft brown and some orange.

D. Stein's Peinture 3, 1955, again German no. 42, in pink, green, yellow and black, reflects a sort of over-mature gaiety and whimsy in a definite manner. And E. Neubauer's Hermoso, no. 31, is a simple affair of colors and straight-sided shapes, all well related in value and size, and most satisfactory.

There are others worth mentioning, particularly among the French, others that will interest the individual spectator. But I think the over-all judgment will stand: Biennale '57 is a disappointing affair.

Best Yet To Be? Lady Leads Suffragettes No! Debaters Say To Bahaman Parliament

The opposition won a dubious victory at a St. Mike's Senate Club debate Wednesday.

The house appeared to be more heavily weighed for the government on the motion, "Resolved that the best is yet to be", but Speaker Lawrence Dewan (SGS) ruled that, "the opposition had obviously won."

A government demand for a recount was refused.

Debate was opened by government speaker Jordan Sullivan (II SMC), who restricted the resolution to, "The best is yet to be . . . particularly for Saint Michael's College."

Sullivan cited greater College activity within the University, an expanding theology department and a greater emphasis on spiritual values to support his argument.

"Saint Michael's will soon entrench itself as the best Catholic College in Canada," said Sullivan.

First opposition speaker James Daly (SGS) reminded the house he need only prove that the government could not prove its point, and that he would not necessarily take the negative stand.

Daly said SMC had a 'split personality'—split between the past and the future.

"There was a day when the Senate Club did not have to fight for its life," said Daly. "Now the club is, we could say, old wine in new bottles."

Daly also criticized the present architecture of the college, and referred to the, "ugly rumours about what goes on here at nights."

Second government speaker Dennis Barber (III SMC) criticized the opposition for comparing past to present.

"We are not speaking of the present but the future," said Barber. "I can see a vision of irreversible movement towards improvement."

Ian Scott ('55) the second Opposition speaker said "the opposition would win hands down if the argument was decided on the basis of repetition. For all through history the cry has been, 'The best is yet to be.'"

"Unlike most graduates," added Scott, "university was the worst period of my life. But I was taught the value of discipline."

"Today St. Mike's students are learning less and have no self-discipline; there is a distrust of learning."

A precedent was set when both the speaker and the clerk temporarily relinquished their posts to speak from the floor in support of the opposition.

Five Senators spoke in support of the government.

A U of T graduate student is leading a passive-resistance fight for woman suffrage in the Bahamian as Mrs. Doris Johnson, a graduate student of Education arrived Wednesday from Nassau, and complained Bahaman women on their 'cool-headed and common-sense approach'.

Earlier this week she led a peaceful-carrying march on the Bahaman parliament. When refused permission to address the House of Assembly, she spoke to Assembly members in a near-by court house.

Mrs. Johnson had telephoned university officials earlier this month for an extension of her Christmas vacation, saying she had an opportunity to address the House.

Beyond woman suffrage, her government will campaign for women on juries, government boards and commissions, and as justices of the peace, the former school principle said.

Mrs. Johnson said she will be "forced to bring charges of tyranny and despotism against this our government if it further denies us our rights."

Alan Lennox-Boyd, Secretary of State in the United Kingdom, has given the vote to Bahaman men who are over 21 years old and meet property qualifications.

Government Bursary Plan Called "Fairest System"

The Ontario government's new policy of fewer bursaries and interest-free loans for senior undergraduates is "the fairest system", F. C. Ashbury, in charge of provincial bursary and loan awards, said yesterday.

"The loans should obviously not be given to junior undergraduates since it would burden them. But they are logical for senior students approaching a job where they can repay the small monthly repayments," Mr. Ashbury said.

The National Federation of Canadian University Students has sent a letter expressing "great concern" and requesting further information, to Education Minister W. J. Dunlop. NUCUS fears the new policy will hamper students wishing to carry on graduate studies, or begin careers in writing or other arts.

A University spokesman said recently about 400 Type E Bursaries, almost the same number as last year, have been awarded so far this year, but nearly all have gone to junior students.

Justice Rules U of T Grads Can Have Exclusive Policy

An Ontario Supreme Court Justice ruled Monday the restriction of a tract of land to U of T graduates only was not against the public policy concerning anti-discrimination legislation.

Mr. Justice Ferguson made the decision after John Galbraith, a son of one of the Madawaska Club's first directors, sued to have the club's by-laws invalidated.

The club has over 1,000 acres of land on Georgian Bay. Only U of T graduates are allowed to hold land there.

Mr. Galbraith charged "the division of children of shareholders into those who may and those who may not inherit their parents' property depending on the place and extent of their formal education is socially undesirable."

Mr. Justice Ferguson decided it was not a matter of public policy if an association wished to exclude persons because of background or training.

"In my view it is a private matter, private to the present shareholders and members of the club", he said.

"If liberty to choose one's own companions and associates is to be denied us, then the loss of liberty to pursue our own calling will shortly follow", he added.

The club was incorporated in 1898 with the preservation and propagation of fish and game as its main aim. Scientific work ceased in 1912 and since then the land has become a summer retreat.

Anonymous Blast Denounces Clique

An anonymous mimeographed statement was distributed yesterday by Vince Kelly, St. Michael's College student council vice-president, attacking the SMC Senate Club and the recent formation of an SMC Debating Union.

Senate Club president Bob Carberry last night denied charges contained in the statement which referred to the SMCDU as "one small, inbred clique seizing a totalitarian political control of the highly-prized and hopeful future of debating at this college."

SMC SAC president Mike McCabe last night said the new union is "the solution the SAC wanted" in response to a statement in the anonymous pamphlet that the union had been formed after "button-holing" of tired SAC members by Senators during a recess in a long SAC meeting last Tuesday.

The SAC, the statement said, took the Senators "at their word" and disenfranchised them as SMC's official debating voice.

In the 1957-58 term, the statement said, the co-educational Oratorical Society was formed. The statement said Senators unsuccessfully "harassed" SAC members to accept a plan "for a new debating union almost the same as proposed this week."

Senator Carberry, last year's Oratorical Society president, denied the Senate Club is a fraternal organization. "The only thing that we're interested in is debating," he said.

He said the fact that Senators are picked only on the basis of quality can be shown by a look at the Senate trials—faculty judges "practically 100 per cent of whom are clergy."

Women have been excluded from the Senate Club, he said, because the 15-man limit would give few women a chance to participate and because women prefer to debate "less on rhetoric and more on fact."

The Senator's female opposite number in the SMCDU, the Forensic Circle, is not a "paper" group as the statement said.

Formed this spring, it has a nine-woman membership, and a 20-woman limit and plans trials in February. President is first-year student Barbara Arrington.

The Oratorical Society, he said, was originally not intended to debate off-campus. Carberry said he last year proposed the Orators be given the privilege "temporarily" to allow women to participate in outside debates.

SNOW was superfluous in the Engineering chariot race Friday. Skufemen slushed and slid their way around the Front Campus, pulling their home-made carts to the finish line in record time. Winners were the freshmen civil engineers, and no serious casualties were sustained. (Varsity staff photo by Robins)

Mac Student Council To Control Discipline

HAMILTON CUP McMaster University's Student Council will be called into special session Wednesday to consider a plan for a Student Discipline Committee to handle all matters of student discipline.

At present student discipline is the joint responsibility of the Students' Council and the university administration.

The four-point manifesto for the proposed student court provides that it:

—will have power to fine students within the limits of $250 alone;

—will have the power to deprive students of privileges with regard to extra-curricular activities; will be able to recommend expulsion from the university; and, have all its decisions subject to review by Mac Arts and Sciences Dean H. S. Armstrong.

The proposed court will consist of five student members, including a "chief judge" and a "clerk."

The first Varsity Council, named by the students' council. In following year's, the court of the outgoing year will appoint its successors.

If the council approves the plan it will then have to go before the university Senate. The plan would probably not take effect before next fall, Mac officials said.

Unveil Jeanneret Window

University College Alumni and Alumnae yesterday paid homage to a veteran of 50 years at the college who retires as UC principal in July.

A French blue rose window over the platform at the front of UC's West Hall was unveiled by U of T Chancellor Santuel Beatty in honor of Principal F. C. A. Jeanneret.

W. G. C. Howland, president of the UC Alumni Association, presented the window on behalf of the graduates. Principal Jeanneret, he said, had always stood for "freedom of thought and independent pursuit of truth unhampered by tradition or any personal code or creed."

The rose window, Mr. Howland said, will serve not only as a "constant reminder" of the friendship and regard of UC graduates for the principal, but as an "inspiration to succeeding generations."

Panels of stained glass radiate spoke-like from the centre of the window, blue glass blended with green and flecked with red.

The device in the centre consists of the traditional Grecian lamp radiating beams of orange-yellow light. Above it is the Latin word "Pax".

Chancellor Beatty said the principal "has always stressed the role of the liberal arts college."

"Every good cause of liberal education in the whole of Canada claimed him," Dr. Beatty said.

The window was dedicated by the Rt. Rev. F. H. Wilkinson, Bishop of Toronto.

Mrs. Gordon Graham, UC

Alumnae president, presented the principal with a book containing the names of all those donating for the window.

The window, she said, was made possible by a large number of small donations including eight from the United Kingdom.

Prof. W. E. Carswell of the U of T Architecture School, designer of the window, presented the principal with a sketch of the window.

Accepting the window, Dr. Jeanneret said he had asked for the word "Pax" to be on the window, considering peace "the summum bonum of all study."

"In this time of tension and tears," he said, "peace is what our world needs above all else."

A reception in UC's East Hall followed the ceremony.

Dr. Jeanneret became UC principal upon the death of Dr. R. W. Taylor in 1951.

GLOW from a new stained-glass window in University College's West Hall was mirrored Sunday by the beam of Principal F. C. A. Jeanneret as he received the congratulations of well-wishers. The window was the gift of UC alumni and alumnae. Dr. Jeanneret retires as principal in July, although he may continue lecturing at the college. (Varsity staff photo by Cavanagh)

Pictures Astray, Officials in Dark

A valuable art collection has disappeared somewhere between Laval University in Quebec City and the University of Toronto.

It was disclosed last night that the show, scheduled to be hung in Hart House Jan. 6-15, had disappeared while in transit from Laval to Toronto early this month.

The show, a group of fifty drawings by young Canadian artists, is on a tour of various Canadian campuses. The tour is sponsored by the National Gallery in Ottawa through the Canadian University Students Art Committee.

When the collection failed to arrive in Toronto, U of T Committee chairman Murray Ross (NY Arch) made inquiries of Laval as to its whereabouts. The Students' Administrative Council sponsors the show on campus.

"Laval has made no reply to our enquiries," Ross said last night. McMaster University in Hamilton was to receive the collection after it had been exhibited in Toronto, and after it failed to arrive the university was forced to hang a group of paintings by young Montreal artists.

Ross requested that the drawings be sent to McMaster when they are located. From Hamilton they are to send their way to Ottawa and then be shipped cross-country to the University of British Columbia.

... penguins, anyone?

Establishment of a University of Toronto exploration and research base 500 miles south of the North Pole was suggested Saturday by a U of T professor.

Dr. R. E. Deane, associate professor of geological sciences at the university, made the suggestion at a Royal Canadian Institute meeting in Toronto.

The base would be set up at Lake Hazen, 500 miles from the pole, in an area described by Dr. Deane as "comparatively accessible and economical for exploration purposes."

Dr. Deane recently returned from International Geophysical Year studies in the region, some 2,700 miles north of Toronto.

If Toronto students and graduates failed to carry out studies there, some other university would, he said.

"McGill university already has a strong foothold in Arctic exploration," he added.

"The surest way of putting Canada's name on the Canadian Arctic is to occupy it," he said.

Permit Drinking Blood Donators Plan Mail Campaign In UBC Fee Raise Battle

Red Cross officials announced last night there are no diet restrictions for donors to the upcoming U of T blood drive Feb. 16-20.

Students are advised to eat a good breakfast on the morning of their appointment.

If you're used to having a drink in the morning, go ahead. Don't drink too much, or you'll be sick when you give blood", campaign chairman Charlotte Hubbell said.

Only restriction is a recommendation that prospective donors refrain from smoking one-half hour before and after giving blood, Miss Hubbell said.

VANCOUVER (CUP)—A growing campaign against the proposed hike in fees is now in full force at the University of British Columbia.

Every student has been urged to write his representative in the provincial government protesting the increase, which might boost fees as much as $100 per student.

UBC's Student Council has made known its intention to carry on the fight against the increase "as far as possible."

Council President Chuck Conaghan has spoken to six student groups since he announced his "grass-roots" campaign two weeks ago.

"To get the facts to as many students as possible" the Council has sent letters asking students to write their representatives, and councillors have been speaking to as many groups as possible.

In a recent campus discussion, Robert Strachan, provincial CCF leader, accused the Social Credit government of deluding students into thinking the government "is doing more for UBC than any previous provincial government".

Film Music From Spain

A figure in the Spanish movie-music world, now studying at the Royal Conservatory of Music, was the guest of the U of T Spanish Club last week.

Mr. Rafael Martinez, a teacher at the Institute of Cinematographic Studies in Madrid and at the Madrid Conservatory, has produced the music for 19 films of which "Ruta de Almenas" won an award from the Council of Cinematographic Writers of Spain.

Mr. Martinez addressed the club on "La Musica Cinematografica", discussing the history of background music in films.

A group of Spanish and Latin American dancers also entertained the club.

sources said last night. The court would have no control over residences. Existing residence house committees would continue to exercise jurisdiction over residence discipline.

The present constitution of the council calls for offenders to be called before the council itself. This clause is not often invoked, sources said.

The move coincides with a ruckus at a social event last year which the university says, resulted in $150 worth of damage.

Tickets for Wednesday's Hart House concert are still available today and tomorrow at the HH porter's desk.

The concert, part of the CBC's "Celebrity Series", features Benno Moiseiwitsch at the piano. Hart House music committee officials apologize to students who tried to get tickets Friday afternoon. Somebody goofed.

Added attraction of the concert: women are also invited.

courting trouble

Today's news that Hamilton's McMaster University is considering setting up a students' court to handle all matters of student discipline demands more serious consideration than may at first seem necessary.

Superficially, we are all in favor of the dual principles such a court would establish: judgment by one's peers and a recognition of students' rights. The proposed system at McMaster differs only slightly from discipline systems found throughout the residences and faculties of the University of Toronto.

The court would impose fines on students, deprive them of privileges, recommend expulsions and subject all decisions to a review by a member of the faculty. At the moment McMaster discipline is the joint responsibility of the students' council and the administration.

The irony of the present situation is that the Caput would now like to see students take over as much of the disciplinary burden as possible, and the students are beginning to realize the problems such a changeover involves.

Student courts are very dangerous things. Unless they are conducted on an extremely high level of intelligence by students of exceptional character, they inevitably attract abuses which are not present under the old concept of authority. Such courts tend to extremes. Students would be less objective than any higher body could possibly be. They will be lenient when they should be harsh, cruel when they should be perceptive.

Much the same system exists in theory at the University of Toronto. One of the purposes of the Students' Administrative Council is to maintain "good behaviour, good conduct and proper discipline of students", when necessary "to make investigations and conduct inquiries" and to make "reports and recommendations to the appropriate body exercising disciplinary jurisdiction as the Council may see fit."

In these terms, stated in the SAC's new constitution, the council acts as a police force but embodies no judicial powers in itself.
